CONGRESSIONAL RECORD,

FIFTY-FIFTH CONGRESS, THIRD SESSION.

They have gone further than that. They have dropped widows from the pension roll who were pensioned under the former practice of the office, where $250 was a bar, and they are tightening around the granting of widows' pensions stringent regulations.

On the other hand, if a widow is left with a house or real estate of any value which she does not rent or receive an income from, that is held to be no bar to the pension. So, if one widow is owning a house worth $5,000 from which she receives no income, that widow worth $5,000 in money gets a pension, while another widow who has no house and is obliged to rent one, and has only $2,000 at 5 per cent interest, gets no pension. The thing is all wrong, and when this question comes before the Committee on Pensions, as I assume it will, I ask that they shall look into the whole matter.

Mr. SULLIVAN. I move to recommit the bill with the amendment to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. HAWLEY. It has not come from the Committee on Pensions. It comes from the Committee on Appropriations. It is not usual, I take it, to desert the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. President——

Mr. COCKRELL. Will the Senator from California yield to me a moment?

Mr. PERKINS. Certainly.

Mr. COCKRELL. In my judgment, and it is sustained by what the Senator from New Hampshire says, this bill would largely increase the number of widows who would be entitled to a pension under the law of June 27, 1890. This provision, allowing an income of $750, would do so beyond any question. But I apprehend that the main part of the objection of the Senator from Mississippi is met in the following language in his amendment:

Provided further, That any person applying for payment of any sum of money as a dependent pensioner after the passage of this act, whether on the pension rolls now or to be placed thereon hereafter, shall be required to affirmatively establish that such person is not in the possession, enjoyment, or receipt of an income of $750 per annum.

I apprehend that that is the main object, and the Senator from Mississippi was not aiming to increase the pensions of widows, but to decrease the pensions of those who, while they have physical disabilities, yet are wealthy, have large incomes, or receive large salaries, etc. I presume that was the class of persons he aimed to strike at.

That is a subject which, as a matter of course, has been discussed and under consideration. All our pension legislation, so far as I now recall, from the foundation of the Government was based upon physical disability for the performance of manual labor. I do not now remember whether, when the pensions were granted by the court under the first pension laws for the Revolutionary war service, financial dependence was required or not, but I know the laws for many years back have not taken into account the financial condition of a soldier who was disabled for the performance of manual labor, and it is a very serious question as to whether it ought not to be taken into the account.

Mr. SULLIVAN. That this may be made clear, and that there may be no doubt about the intention and purpose of the amendment, I shall ask to modify it further. On page 1, line 3, after the words "any person," insert the words "not the widow of a deceased soldier;" so that it will read this way:

Provided, That no pension shall be paid, out of the moneys herein appropriated or to be hereafter appropriated to pay any pension, to any person not the widow of a deceased soldier, as a dependent pensioner under the act of June 27, 1890, who has an income from any property or office or otherwise amounting to $750 per year outside of the pension.

Now, that clearly and distinctly shows that the class of people who have a competency are not to be embraced, and it does not leave the widow to receive more than she would otherwise receive, which meets the point criticised by the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, a single observation before this matter is disposed of.

In the first place, I want to state with some degree of emphasis that this amendment is proposed to affect only pensions granted under the act of June 27, 1890. I have been annoyed somewhat during the past year because of the fact that every time I make a suggestion in the Senate regarding a pension bill in the line of the curtailment of appropriations, the press immediately announces that I am for tearing up the laws relating to pensions and depriving soldiers and the widows of soldiers of their proper rights under the law. I undertook to get a bill through denying pensions to these new-made widows, and did get it through the Senate. It met its coup de grace at the hands of the House committee. It was a bill denying pensions to the young women who are marrying the old soldiers, and who will be drawing pensions in 1980 if they are as fortunate as the widows of the Revolutionary soldiers, some of whom are now on the rolls. Immediately it was heralded to the country that I was trying to deprive all the widows of soldiers of the country of a pension, and so, in self-protection, I want to emphasize the fact that this proposed amendment relates only to the law of June 27, 1890, known as the dependent-pension act.

Now, Mr. President, I want to make an appeal to my friend from Mississippi. This matter has been before the Committee on Pensions. It is subject to a point of order, which, I understand, is to be made. The matter has been discussed, and there seems to be a feeling that the Senator's proposed amendment, after it has been duly considered and sifted, and perhaps modified somewhat, may be a proper amendment to our pension laws. It occurs to me that the matter had better go over to be considered on the next pension appropriation bill rather than to have an attempt made to put it upon this bill, an attempt which I apprehend would fail if it should be persisted in.

Mr. SULLIVAN. I introduced in the House last spring a similar bill. It was with the very greatest difficulty that I could get it out of the pigeonhole in the committee room. Finally I got a report, a favorable one, from the House Committee on Pensions. If it is right and if it is proper to eliminate this class of people from the pension roll, we can not begin the good work any too soon. If that class of people do not need this assistance, they ought to be cut out, and now is a very good time to begin. It may be true that the point of order may be made and the amendment may be rejected, but if we wish to do that which it appears to me to be the proper thing it occurs to me that this is the right time to do it. For that reason I shall insist upon the amendment.

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. President, your committee considering the appropriation bill for invalid and other pensions had only before them the general laws relating to the payment of pensions. Several propositions were presented to your committee proposing new legislation. They unanimously held that the general appropriation bill was not the place for new legislation, no matter how meritorious it might be. Therefore, they instructed me that if any amendment was proposed changing the existing pension laws, I should make the point of order that it was new legislation and therefore would not be in order upon this bill. In compliance with those instructions, I make that point of order.

Mr. SEWELL. Mr. President, I think the Senator in charge of the bill is perfectly right in raising a point of order upon the amendment. If such amendments were admissible I should like to see the amendment placed upon the bill which passed the Senate once and was rejected by the House. It was offered on the appropriation bill a short time ago and was adopted by the subcommittee, but it was relegated to the rear by the whole committee. That amendment prohibited the issuing of a pension to a woman married after the passage of this bill. I think it is one of the crying evils of the pension law at the present time that young women 20 or 25 years of age gather around Soldiers' Homes, and taking men in the last stages of life, marry them for the sake of perpetuating the pension. They have no inherent right to such a pension.

The original widow may properly draw a pension. I do not like to see that right curtailed by law. It is a right which was acquired for her by the services of her husband. But the young woman who to-day marries a man with the idea of having a pension all her life should not receive it, in my opinion. I would like to offer that amendment if the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER] will let me have it. I offer it as an amendment to this bill.

Mr. ALLISON. What has become of the amendment of the Senator from Mississippi?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair understands that the amendment pending is the one offered by the Senator from Mississippi.

Mr. PERKINS. Let the ruling of the Chair be had on that amendment.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair is constrained to sustain the point of order made by the Senator from California. The amendment is obnoxious to the rule.

Mr. SEWELL. Now, Mr. President, I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. After the word "separately," in line 6, insert the following:

Provided further, That no part of this appropriation shall be used for payment of pensions granted, allowed, or paid, under any law of the United States granting pensions, to the widow or minor child of any officer, soldier, sailor, or marine who has served, is now serving, or shall hereafter serve in the Army or Navy of the United States, or in any State militia organization called into the service of the United States, unless it shall be proved and established that the marriage of such widow to the person upon whose service and death the claim is based occurred prior to the passage of this act, or shall hereafter occur prior to or during the military or naval service of such person: Provided, however, That this provision shall not apply to the widows or minor children of soldiers and sailors who served in the recent war with Spain.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, that amendment is substantially in its terms the same as the bill that passed the Senate at the last session and went to the House, but did not receive the approval of the Committee on Invalid Pensions of the House. I submitted it to the Committee on Appropriations and supposed it was going in the bill, but in their wisdom they did not insert it.

The Senator from Colorado [Mr. TELLER] is strongly opposed to this amendment, and he inquired of me this afternoon as to whether I was going to offer it, saying that he should make a point of order against it. I said to the Senator that if he was to make a point of order against the amendment I would not offer it; and the Senator has left the Senate Chamber with the understanding that it was not to be offered by me. In justice to that Senator I make this statement. Of course, any other Senator can offer the amendment if he chooses, but I want the conversation I had with the Senator from Colorado distinctly understood.

Now, Mr. President, the evil against which this proposed amendment is aimed is found in the report of the Commissioner of Pensions. By the way, I will state that the Commissioner of Pensions has very strongly recommended this legislation. It appears that there are on the rolls now 5 widows of Revolutionary soldiers; there are 3 survivors of the war of 1812 and 2,407 widows of soldiers of the war of 1812. There are 3 soldiers and 2,407 widows of the war of 1812 surviving, while there are 5 widows of the Revolutionary war.

In making a report upon the bill I called attention to the fact that if we went on as we have been doing in reference to pensioning widows, we would be pensioning the widows of the late civil war in the year 1980, almost one hundred years from the present time. I am strongly in favor of the legislation. I shall be constrained to vote for this amendment, if it does not go out on a point of order and if it is submitted to the Senate. Yet I regret exceedingly that I inadvertently misled the Senator from Colorado into the idea that the amendment would not be offered.

Mr. HAWLEY. Mr. President, the Senator from New Hampshire can very easily bring in an independent bill to cover this and the other amendment, if he chooses. I should think very likely they both might pass. Certainly that would be a fair way of considering them.

Mr. GALLINGER. If the Senator will permit me, I will state that at the last session of the present Congress the Senate did pass this identical bill, but I am not at liberty, of course, to say more than I have said. It has not received favorable consideration elsewhere. I have some question in my own mind whether a point of order will technically lie against this amendment. It provides a method of administering the appropriations made under the bill. But possibly I am wrong.

Mr. TELLER. I desire to make a point of order on the amendment. Certainly it is legislation; and it is legislation, I think, of a very bad character.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair will sustain the point of order, for the same reason that the former point was sustained. The bill is before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole, and open to amendment.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. President, recently I gave notice that I would offer an amendment to the pension appropriation bill providing that in the future the Government shall make no discrimination in the matter of pensions between the citizens of the different States. I ask that the amendment be read as a part of my remarks at this point.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to insert, after the enacting clause of the bill, the following:

That from and after the passage of this act every pension law now on the statute books shall apply to every invalid soldier, widow, minor children, dependent relative, the army nurses, and all other pensioners who may be able to prove their claim under the present pension laws, without regard to whether said soldier was enlisted in the Federal or Confederate service of the late civil war of 1861 to 1865: Provided, That those enlisted in the Confederate service shall not draw any back pensions prior to the passage of this act, but their claim under existing laws shall begin and become operative with the passage of this act.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. President, I should be glad to see a provision like that adopted, coupled with the amendment proposed by the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. SULLIVAN]. It is noticeable that the proposed amendment has met with very little opposition from the North. I have received many letters from Northern soldiers strongly favoring the proposition, and, indeed, I am constrained to believe that if it were submitted to the Grand Army of the Republic it would be indorsed by an overwhelming majority vote.

But the proposition has met with an unexpected divided sentiment in the South. Some Confederate veteran camps have passed resolutions opposing the proposition, which they have had presented to the Senate. Now, I have the greatest respect and deference for the opinions and sentiments of those Confederate veterans who belong to the camps which have expressed opposition to the proposed amendment, but I submit that only a small per cent of the Confederate soldiers are members of camps and that only a small number of camps have expressed opposition. Therefore it would be unwarranted to conclude that the resolutions sent in represent the general sentiments of the Confederate veterans. Indeed, I know from the large number of letters I have received that they do not represent the sentiment of a great many. But since there is such a division of sentiment, I will ask the indulgence of the Senate to state my views and reasons for favoring the amendment.

My father was a Confederate soldier, and if I had been old enough I should have been in the Confederate army by his side; but I have never considered myself a traitor nor the son of a traitor. My father did not rebel against nor take up arms against the Federal Government of the States. He was a citizen of a sovereign State which in 1861 saw fit, or rather, I should say, was forced, to exercise its constitutional right to withdraw from the compact of 1787.

North Carolina acceded to the compact of 1787, and she did it as an independent and sovereign State. In her sovereign capacity she ceded to the Federal Government created under the compact called the Constitution certain powers to be exercised by the Federal Government of all the States in consideration of certain advantages to be gained by being a party to the compact and a member of the federation of States; but she reserved all of the powers not expressly ceded, and all of the powers thus expressly reserved she continued to exercise and had a right to continue to exercise in her sovereign capacity. One of the many powers expressly reserved, because it was not ceded, was the right and power to withdraw from the compact whenever it was no longer advantageous or desirable to remain in it.

Let no one misunderstand me. I am not contending that the States still have that reserved right. We are now living under a new compact—the Appomattox compact of 1865, which denies that right. I am discussing the right of each State under the compact of 1787, and under which our Government was conducted until 1861.

Now, let us go back a moment to the original compact, known as the Confederation, for it throws much light upon the nature of the compact of 1787.

In that compact, which formed the first Federal Government, and which lasted for six years, it was expressly stipulated that the compact should be perpetual. North Carolina and all the thirteen original States had acceded to that compact, but North Carolina and other States withdrew or seceded from it when it was not advantageous or desirable to longer remain in it. The States that seceded or withdrew from the Confederation found themselves so embarrassed in withdrawing from a compact which had expressly declared that the compact should be perpetual that in forming the new compact, known now as the Constitution of the United States, they took care not to declare that it should be perpetual.

Nothing is clearer than that the convention of 1787, which drew up the new compact, purposely left out the declaration and agreement that the new compact should be perpetual, and did so because the parties to the compact did not desire to make such an agreement. A proposition was made in that convention to try to make the compact binding on all the States when two-thirds or even a majority had acceded to it. But this proposition was considered monstrous, or, I might say, it was not considered seriously at all. Each State in its sovereign capacity acted for itself and by itself, and the compact was to be binding only on the States that acceded to it, and then only to the extent that the powers expressly ceded were to be exercised by the Government to be formed under the compact.

It was some time before the State of Rhode Island acceded to the compact and acted as one of the Federation of States. There was no right nor power in the opinion of the framers of the compact to force Rhode Island to accede to the compact or to be in any way controlled or governed by the Government of the Federation of States, unless Rhode Island should of her own free will and accord so elect. Rhode Island did stand out as a separate, independent, and sovereign State for some time, and she could have so stood out with a separate government of her own, as independent and sovereign as any country or government in the world, to this day if she had so desired. No one will deny this.

Then how could Rhode Island lose her sovereign rights and powers to withdraw from the compact and resume all of her independent, sovereign functions and powers when she had never ceded these rights and powers upon acceding to the compact? If Rhode Island had continued to refuse to accede to the compact of 1787, and several other States had taken the same position that Rhode Island did, then these States could have entered into a compact of their own and formed another federal government to which they would have ceded certain of their sovereign powers for their mutual advantage, under whatever terms and conditions the several States might have agreed upon. Who will deny this? Thus we see that each State had a right to accede to the compact or stay out and exercise independently all of her sovereign functions, or, staying out of the compact of 1787, had the sovereign power to enter into any other compact with any other State.

We see also by the compact of 1787 that when any State did accede to the compact it did so by ceding only certain powers to the Federal Government of the States, and that all powers not so ceded were reserved to be exercised by the State in her sovereign capacity. We also see that no State entering into the compact of 1787 ever ceded to the Government of the States its sovereign right to withdraw from the compact; and further, that the compact itself expressly left out any declaration that it was to be perpetual, as the former compact contained.

So when South Carolina withdrew from the compact in 1861 she simply exercised a sovereign right and power which she had reserved, and which Rhode Island and every other State reserved when it entered into the compact and ceded certain powers to the Federal Government of the States. Everybody admits that the first Federal Government formed, known as the Confederation, was a compact between the States, and that every State had the reserved right under that compact to withdraw, even though the compact was declared to be perpetual. Then how much truer it must have been under the present compact, which was not to be perpetual.

No one ever denied that the States had reserved, among their other reserved sovereign rights, the right and power to withdraw from the compact when it was no longer desirable or advantageous to remain in it, until Mr. Webster brought forth the new doctrine and set up the claim in his famous debate in this body with Calhoun in 1833. Only three years before Webster did not take such a position in his speech on the Foote resolutions. He admitted then that the Constitution was a compact. Massachusetts and all New England expressed this view in 1815 and came near acting on it. The South acted on it in 1861.

Therefore when the Southern States withdrew from the compact, they did not rebel against the other States or against the Government set up under the compact. They simply withdrew from the compact peaceably and in the exercise of their reserved constitutional powers. In doing this they were not disloyal to the other States or to the government of the States, but they were loyal to truth and justice and to the compact of 1787. If other States, which had before recognized this right of each State, had not desired at that time to deny this right and had not decided to do so by force, there would have been no conflict of arms.

North Carolina did not desire to withdraw from the compact or Union, and would not have done so if South Carolina had not been forcibly denied her right to withdraw in peace. After South Carolina had seceded, the people of my State by popular vote and by an overwhelming majority decided not to withdraw from the Union. We recognized the constitutional right of South Carolina or any other State to withdraw, but we took the position that our State had no just cause to withdraw and that it was desirable to remain in the Union.

Mr. GEAR. May I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. BUTLER. Certainly.

Mr. GEAR. Did not a large number of people in North Carolina shoulder arms to destroy the Union?

Mr. BUTLER. Not a single man.

Mr. GEAR. Not a single man who was in the rebel army?

Mr. BUTLER. There was no rebel army. Not a single man or State took up arms against the Federal Government.

Mr. GEAR. What did they take up arms for?

Mr. BUTLER. They did not take up arms till they were forced to do it. They took up arms in self-defense. All that South Carolina did, and all that any other Southern State did, was to ask to withdraw from the Union in peace, as each State had a constitutional right to do when it was no longer desirable or profitable to remain in the federation under the compact.

Mr. GEAR. It is true they asked that.

Mr. BUTLER. That was the position of the South, and it was not until that right was denied by force——

Mr. GEAR. Did not 2,000,000 men in arms in the North deny that right and assert the right of the Union? If that is not so, then I am mistaken in the history of the country.

Mr. BUTLER. That is true, but might does not make right. There was a radical difference between the States as to the nature of the compact—as to what powers were ceded to the Federal Government and what powers each State reserved to itself upon entering the compact. North Carolina and the other Southern States contended that they had reserved certain sovereign rights, which contention had been generally conceded and never denied by anyone, as far as I know, before 1833. It is true that a majority of the States denied this right in 1861, and that at their call 2,000,000 men took up arms.

Mr. GEAR. I wish to ask the Senator is it not a fact that the 2,000,000 men in the North took up arms to dispute the claim of North Carolina?

Mr. BUTLER. Yes; of course, they took up arms to deny that right, and did it by force. That settled the right of each State in the future, but it did not settle or blot out the fact that each State had that constitutional right before 1865. That is the fact I intend to establish and to prove, if the Senator will give me his attention——

Mr. GEAR. Yes.

Mr. BUTLER. That not a single Southern soldier was a traitor or a rebel against this Government and that not a single one took up arms to destroy it.

Mr. GEAR. Then were the large number of people who disagreed with them in the North traitors?

Mr. BUTLER. No; I do not charge that. But we think that the Northern States were wrong in denying us the constitutional right to withdraw. We accord the North the sincerity of conviction which we claim for ourselves. We disagreed with you in your constitutional construction, and you exercised force to make us agree to your constitutional construction, while we desired to exercise our constitutional construction by withdrawing in peace. The compact was amended in 1865 by force, and we recognize now that it was amended.

Mr. GALLINGER. I do not want to disturb the Senator, but this is interesting to me. The Senator contends that North Carolina had a right to withdraw from the Union?

Mr. BUTLER. I most certainly do.

Mr. GALLINGER. And set up a government for herself?

Mr. BUTLER. I do. She had the same right not to have gone into the compact—to have stayed out forever, as Rhode Island did for some time.

Mr. GALLINGER. If each State in the Union had that right, we might have had forty-three or forty-four separate governments here instead of the one we now have. Is it the Senator's argument that constitutionally we could have had a number of governments?

Mr. BUTLER. Under the compact of 1787 that is exactly what could have happened. But the Senator is evading the question of each State's constitutional right and is discussing expediency. I will come to that later in my argument; but I will say now, since the Senator has asked me the question, that I am not standing here to defend the wisdom of that provision of the compact of 1787. That is not the question. In fact, I believe it was a mistake that the compact of 1787 was of such a nature that it left this reserved right to each State.

Mr. GALLINGER. Now, if the Senator will permit me, he is wrong in saying that I have evaded anything purposely, because I have had no such thought in my mind at all, and I propose to listen very attentively to the Senator's argument. It is a novel argument to me, certainly.

Mr. SPOONER. No, it is not.

Mr. GALLINGER. I simply want to ask the Senator a plain question, whether if South Carolina had a right to secede and form a government, and North Carolina had that right, we might have had constitutionally, according to the Senator's argument, forty-two or forty-three governments here in place of the one we now have?

Mr. BUTLER. Just exactly as we had thirteen sovereign governments before we went into the compact and ceded certain powers to it, to be exercised by all of them.

Mr. GALLINGER. That is what I wanted to know.

Mr. GEAR. I do not want to interrupt the Senator in his remarks, but I want to make the point of order on the amendment he offers that it is new legislation.

Mr. GALLINGER. That can not be done in the midst of the Senator's speech.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. President, the point of order certainly can not be made against my speech.

Mr. GEAR. I say I do not want to disturb the Senator's remarks, but I shall make the point of order after he concludes.

Mr. BUTLER. I stated that North Carolina recognized the constitutional right of South Carolina to withdraw, but North Carolina, by an overwhelming majority, voted that she would not withdraw, because she did not believe that it was wise for her to do so. She did not think she had sufficient provocation.

This view was ably and successfully maintained by the late Senator Vance, who was known as a Union man, and who was one of the most loved and honored men my State has ever produced. But when we were called upon to take up arms and make war upon South Carolina for exercising her constitutional rights, then North Carolina, by an almost unanimous vote, decided to withdraw also. She was forced to take that course in self-defense and in defense of her own rights, and to keep from being a party to violating the compact of 1787 with shot and shell.

Mr. President, we did not take up arms against the Government, as I said, but the majority of the States denying this right took up arms and invaded the South by force to amend the compact, or rather to force the South to agree to the recently formed views of the North as to the nature of the compact. The North did not hold this view before 1833, and nobody held it before that time, so far as I have been able to find. Even Gouverneur Morris, who went into the Constitutional Convention and fought for a strong government and wanted to make a compact between the people and not between the States, admitted that they did not succeed, and that it was simply a compact between the States.

Therefore every gun fired by every Southern soldier was fired in self-defense—in defense of the sovereign and constitutional rights of his State and in defense of his home and fireside.

It was a most unnecessary and unjustifiable war. It was as unjustifiable and indefensible as it would have been for the other States to have taken up arms in 1787 to force Rhode Island to accede to the compact. The Southern States did not desire war; they wished no quarrel with other States that did not agree with them as to their constitutional right; they simply wanted to exercise their constitutional right which they understood they reserved when they entered the compact, and to go their way in peace and to leave every other State in peace.

But let us draw a curtain over the fratricidal conflict with its horrible loss of life and property and now look only at the result. At Appomattox, in 1865, the much-disputed constitutional question which had been so ably argued by Calhoun and Webster in this body in 1833 and many times thereafter, was settled forever according to the Northern view by force of arms. Thus the compact of 1787 was amended, or, according to the Northern view, finally construed, whichever you please, so as to read "that each State entering into this compact surrenders forever its sovereignty to the Federal Government of the States and expressly surrenders any and all rights to ever withdraw from the compact for any cause whatever."

How unfortunate that this was not written in the face of the compact of 1787, and if it was implied, how unfortunate Massachusetts and New England could not have seen it in 1815 and the South could not have seen it in 1861. But let that be as it may. The result of the war was simply to determine from now on and forever the nature of the compact, to make it perpetual. It was a contest over a constitutional construction such as are constantly being judicially determined by the courts and one loyally acceded to, recognized, and lived up to by all parties concerned. Thus we see that the late war was different from any other war ever waged and there can never be another one like it. Therefore, the participants in it should occupy different relations to each other than those between victor and vanquished or even those usually occupied between combatants.

Mr. President, when the direful constitutional conflict ended at Appomattox the Southern States accepted the construction of the Constitution made by force of arms to the effect that the compact was perpetual. The South accepted this verdict in good faith and has been as loyal every hour to the compact according to this new construction, and always will be, as they were before loyal to the other construction. According to the Northern view the Southern States were never out of the compact, but the difference in construction was fought out in the Union, every Southern soldier and every citizen of every Southern State in the meantime remaining citizens of the United States.

Now, Mr. President, when this conflict between citizens of the United States, representing equal States, as to the nature of the compact between the States was settled at Appomattox, and the Southern States accepted the perpetual-compact construction and gave allegiance and loyalty to that doctrine, then there should never have been a suggestion of a discrimination against the South or her soldiers on that account any more than there should have been against Calhoun for his speech in 1833.

If the Confederate soldier of 1861 was a traitor, equally was Calhoun a traitor in 1833, and equally was Massachusetts a treasonable State in 1815. I believe that the life and services of Calhoun are as proud a heritage of this Federal Government of the States as the life and services of Webster. I believe that the grave of every Southern soldier, made in defense of the constitutional rights of his State as he understood them, is as great a tribute to American valor as the grave of every Northern soldier made in defense of the constitutional rights of his State as he understood them.

Just so, I believe that every empty sleeve, every crutch, and every battle-scarred face of every Southern soldier is as great a tribute to American valor as every crutch and empty sleeve and scarred veteran of the Grand Army of the Republic. The Union is now perpetual and has been since Lee and Grant faced each other at Appomattox. The flag of every State will hereafter float with the flag of all the States forever, in prosperity or adversity, in peace or in war, always united for the common good and against any and all foreign foes. Then why should there longer be permitted to remain or to exist the least discrimination between citizens of this great Republic of united and indissoluble States?

Mr. President, these are the views that my father taught me when I was a boy, and my investigation and study have confirmed them. Holding these views, it seemed to me that after thirty-four years the time was opportune, just upon the close of a successful war against a foreign foe in which the ex-Confederate veteran and the Northern soldier stood side by side under a common flag, fighting for a common country, to completely wipe out every vestige of past differences by removing every vestige of sectional discrimination. If the time has not come to do this, pray when will it come?

Mr. President, I believe that the Confederate soldiers hold to the same view with reference to their action and the action of their States in the late war. Therefore it is to be regretted that some of the resolutions sent here by certain Confederate veteran camps have been worded in a way to admit of a different construction. Some of them have seemed to apologize for their action and the action of their States and to admit by indirection that they took up arms against the Federal Government to destroy it. Surely no Southern soldier can consider himself a traitor, and surely there is no cause why any Southern soldier should apologize in any way for his action or the action of his State in 1861.

The fact is, Mr. President, and history will so record it, the South was constitutionally right. The South knows she was standing on her constitutional rights. The world knows it, and history will so record it, and it is the duty of every Southern citizen, as well as every Southern soldier, to do all he can to see it so recorded in history as it should be recorded, and not allow a prejudiced historian to brand his father or his grandfather as a traitor or a man who deserves to be treated as a rebel in any sense.

We are now living under a new compact, and nobody is more loyal to this new compact than the ex-Confederate soldier. It may be a better compact than the one of 1787, and I believe it is, but whether the compact of 1787 was wise or best has nothing to do with the question which determines the status of the Confederate soldier. The compact of 1787 existed and every State had rights under it, and the South simply exercised those rights. Whether wisely or not is another question.

I do not want, Mr. President, to be understood as criticising any of the resolutions. I simply call attention to the fact that they were drawn inadvertently in that respect, but it is nevertheless to be regretted. A leading Southern paper, the Charleston News and Courier, in a leading article on January 12, 1899, editorially laments the wording of the resolutions to which I have referred. In fact, the editorial is so appropriate to the question before the Senate that I ask the Secretary to read it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

On his recent visit to Charleston Senator HOAR told us that we could now speak frankly and fully on all public questions, and there is no harm, of course, in talking and writing about BUTLER and his bill. In our opinion the Southern newspapers and the Confederate camps and organizations have said altogether too much in deprecation of the movement for Confederate pensions.

A great deal that has been said, as the records will show, has been said by way of apology and in a spirit of subserviency. We have not asked for pensions, and there is no reason why we should refuse what has not been offered. All that we have said in a boastful way about our ability to take care of our own veterans has not been warranted by anything that we have done during thirty years of neglect. The old soldiers of Lancaster County are probably nearer the truth than the army of protestants who have been passing resolutions and "eating dirt" since BUTLER introduced his bill:

"While they would never ask the United States Government for pensions, these veterans would cheerfully accept the same if granted them by Congress."

And if Congress shall "grant them," our word for it, the Abou ben Adhems, who have been crying out most lustily against BUTLER and his bill will lead all the rest. We do not ask for and do not expect pensions, but Congress ought to be very careful not to make any offers on this line if it does not wish a prompt and cheerful acceptance.

Mr. BUTLER. While that utterance comes from the Charleston News and Courier, another South Carolina paper takes a different view, which misrepresents the true position of its State and the whole South. The Spartanburg Herald uses this language in opposing the proposition:

The ex-Confederates have nothing to ask of the Government that they fought four years to destroy.

The editor proceeds in the same editorial to say we are amply able to take care of all of our disabled soldiers without asking anybody's help or leave. I do not know who the editor is, but he certainly speaks without a knowledge of the facts. Each Southern State has done, no doubt, all it could, but no State has been able to do for the Confederate soldier what he deserves.

Mr. President, I have here a letter from the widow of a Confederate soldier, inclosing a clipping from the Lancaster (S. C.) Review, which, no doubt, comes nearer representing the sentiments of the Confederate soldiers of South Carolina and the other Southern States. The letter is as follows:

DEAR SIR: I inclose you a clipping from the Lancaster Review in reference to pensioning the Confederates. There may be a few objections, but on the whole I think you would find it acceptable. The few who survive surely need such aid, and the South is too poor to help them.

Respectfully,

Mrs. L. B. FOSTER, Lancaster, S. C.

Hon. BUTLER, Washington, D. C.

The clipping is as follows:

The papers generally are discussing the proposition to pension the old Confederate soldiers by the National Government. Some of them are taking it for granted that the veterans would reject such aid with scorn and indignation. We have talked with a number of old soldiers upon the subject, and the consensus of opinion, as learned by us, is that while they would never ask the United States Government for pensions the veterans would cheerfully accept the same if granted them by Congress.

The resolutions recently adopted by a Kentucky camp express exactly the sentiment of those with whom we have conversed. The Kentucky veterans say that "while we are in no sense applicants for pensions," yet "if the people of the North should become magnanimous enough to put our poor soldiers upon the pension pay roll, we see no reason why we should not accept."—Lancaster Review.

Here is another from an Arkansas paper:

Congress should enact a law pensioning all ex-Confederate veterans of 60 years of age and upward. It is true they have not asked for such a law, but this is no reason why it should not be passed, leaving it optional with each one to decide for himself whether he will accept the same or not. Of course the Grand Army of the Republic and the Confederate Veterans have a right to "resolve," but they do not represent all the ex soldiers that were in the civil war. In fact, we think there has always been too much partisan politics in these organizations.

The "Revolutionary descendant" racket is now being worked up into a kind of aristocracy clan, and fifty years from now the civil war societies will take the same chute. It makes no difference what a man's great granddaddy was, but it is quite another thing to really know what the living man is today. Eighty-one old ex-Confederate veterans at the "Home" near this city have published a card in the Little Rock Gazette expressing a willingness to receive a pension from the National Government. The past is dead in fact, and it should likewise be in spirit. All over this country the children of ex-Federal and ex-Confederate soldiers have intermarried. A new race has grown up, and this great Government should not be forced into a false position by "societies" who persist in living in the spirit of the dead past.—North Little Rock (Ark.) Times.

Mr. President, I have made a few selections from a large number of letters which I have received. I think they fairly represent in sentiment all the letters that have come to me, and as far as my observation goes in my own section, they represent the sentiment of a large majority of Confederate veterans. Here is a letter from a man who was an officer in the Confederate army from Virginia. I ask that his letter be read. It is sometimes well to hear from the people.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will read as requested.

RICEVILLE, VA., December 26, 1898.

DEAR SIR: I am glad to see that you have offered the only sensible solution of all the sectional questions that have grown out of the war. The proposition of the President at Macon to assist by Government aid the preservation of Confederate graves is a very worthy sentiment, but it would help no one. We may assist by your bill the living and help distribute money and build up waste places and relieve the necessities of old, worn-out heroes. The President's plan would only preserve the graves, with some exceptions, of those who died in prison and hospitals, over half of whom never fired a shot.

Men who were killed in battle were either thrown in pits or not buried at all, and it would at this day be utterly impossible to find and mark the graves of the most heroic dead. The true generals of the Confederate army were the private soldiers, and the South won her glory by the exalted and heroic courage of her humble children, and not by the tactics of her generals; and it is a great mistake to give the generals all the glory. But I did not start out to discuss these merits, but simply to say yours is the only sensible solution of the whole question and the only one that will give relief to anybody.

In your bill you say to the North, the South for over thirty years has been paying punitive taxation to pension your citizens. She has grown poorer as she was compelled to do by distributing throughout the North an amount equal to the wealth of Virginia or North Carolina. Every year such a course must make the South poorer and the North richer. You claim that sectional lines have been abolished. Now, there are but few maimed, wounded, and disabled Confederates living. These men have not only offered their services, but they have sent their children to fight for the nation in the present war. If you mean what you say, show your generosity, your magnanimity, by voting for my bill.

I feel that I had a right to write this letter to you, as I commanded a regiment in the Confederate army and had three sons (all I have) in the United States service in this war against Spain. One of my sons, Addison Witcher, belonged to Company F, Ninth United States Infantry. After gallantly leading the charge and storming San Juan on the 1st of July, he gave his valuable and heroic life to the Government on the 18th day of October from sickness and fever contracted in the service. Of the other two, after serving in the Third Virginia and being honorably discharged, one of them reenlisted in the Fourth Virginia Regiment and is now in Cuba, and I myself tendered my services to the Government, and there are thousands of men in the Army who are the children of the men who followed Lee and Johnston.

* * * * * * *

Yours, truly,

V. A. WITCHER.

Senator MARION BUTLER,
Washington, D. C.

Mr. BUTLER. Here is one from Tennessee which fairly represents the sentiment of a great many other letters from Tennessee.

CHATTANOOGA, TENN., December 30, 1898.

DEAR SIR: Your bill to pension needy ex-Confederate soldiers is right. It should have been introduced twenty years ago. Our civil war was a family fight which had to be. My oldest brother, William A. Beasley, was captain of a company from Cincinnati on the Union side, while I was on the Confederate side from Memphis in the One hundred and fifty-fourth Tennessee Regiment. Only five of my company are living, and only two of them are needy, one of whom is crippled.

Yours, truly, JOHN R. BEASLEY.

Mr. BUTLER. Here are a number of other letters from different States, which are only a part of those that I have received, but I will detain the Senate to read but a few.

I wish to call special attention to the fact which struck me in reading these letters, that many of these Confederate soldiers now have sons who volunteered for the late war against Spain and who were in Cuba or the Philippines fighting for their country.

Here is a letter which I ask to be read, although it is a page long, because I know the man who wrote it. He has written an intelligent letter. He is a representative man, and I believe he represents fairly the sentiments of the Confederate veterans of his section. He is now a member of the State legislature from the county of Sampson.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

STATE OF NORTH CAROLINA HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Raleigh, N. C., January 25, 1899.

DEAR SENATOR: I have been thinking for some time of writing you a few lines to let you know how I stand on the position you have taken to pension the Confederate soldier. You are right, and I am with you from first to last. If Congress will pass your amendment it will be only an act of justice which has already been too long delayed. In the first place the South is not financially able to take care of her wounded and dependent Confederate soldiers as their merits and necessities deserve and require.

We lost our most valuable property as a result of the war and are not able to pay sufficient taxes to run the Federal Government and pay pensions to Northern soldiers too, and, in addition, pay a direct State tax sufficient to properly pension the Confederate soldier. In the second place, the Confederate soldier was not a rebel or a traitor, so there is no reason why he should apologize for the course he took or should now refuse to accept a pension from his own Government, which he is paying taxes to support and fighting to defend, and, at the same time, there is no shadow of reason why the Government should longer discriminate against him. The courage, valor, and heroism displayed by Southern soldiers in fighting for what they believed to be right was certainly equal to that ever displayed by any soldier in the world's history, and that is now the common heritage of a common country, equal with the valor and heroism displayed by the Northern soldiers.

I am surprised at some of the resolutions that have been passed by certain Confederate Veteran camps opposing your proposition. I am surprised at the reasons they gave. If these men do not want to accept a pension, let them speak for themselves when the pension is offered by refusing to accept it. The number who have taken part in passing these resolutions are very few, and they should not try to speak for the great mass of Confederate soldiers. I tell you these resolutions do not represent the sentiment of the mass of Confederate soldiers, who are with you and in favor of your proposition. I know whereof I speak. May God bless you in your effort.

Yours, truly,

R. M. CRUMPLER.

Hon. MARION BUTLER,
Washington, D. C.

Mr. BUTLER. In connection with this letter, I wish to call attention to the last report of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, which shows that North Carolina pays internal-revenue taxes alone of $3,250,213.06, whilst she gets back in pensions only $561,292.50. The State of Iowa draws $5,549,978 in pensions and pays in internal-revenue taxes the small sum of $479,366.88.

This report shows—I merely use those two States—that more money is paid back to the North in pensions than the sum total of all the internal-revenue taxes paid. Not only does the North get back in pensions every dollar that it pays in internal revenue, but a large part of that which is paid in the South is taken and transferred to the North. The South has never objected to the pensioning of the soldiers of the North. Southern men have sat here Congress after Congress and voted cheerfully for pensions, often passing a pension bill carrying $150,000,000 in ten minutes.

But that does not remove the fact that each year money is being transplanted from one section to the other, and that one great section that came out of the war poor, with its property destroyed, its fields laid waste—a people going home to try to build up from nothing, not only with their most valuable property but with their means for creating wealth gone—has had each year a drain of taxation upon it that has made that disproportion greater. That should not be so. I do not place the justness for pensions for Southern soldiers on that ground, but I call attention to it as a matter of taxation which deserves the attention of this body.

Not only in that respect but under other schemes of taxation which we enact here a large draft is being constantly made upon the South, and when the money is expended, the majority of it, and a larger proportion than is paid by the North, is spent outside of the South. The effect is to bring about what we have in the South, a condition of hard times that is greater than should exist there and greater than exists probably in any other section of this country, considering our natural resources and the industry of our people and the amount of produce that we create.

Mr. President, here are some other letters from Confederate veterans, which are only a few of the many I have received, but which fairly represent the general sentiments expressed, which I ask to go into the RECORD.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

The letters referred to are as follows:

ROANOKE, VA., January 20, 1899.

DEAR SIR: I wish to speak a word to you in regard to the bill you are pressing to pension Confederate soldiers. I am a one-armed Confederate soldier and would be glad if the bill is passed, and I believe I speak the true sentiments of nine-tenths of the Confederate soldiers. You will do us a great favor by doing all you can to get the bill passed.

Yours, respectfully,

M. H. HAYMAKER.

Senator BUTLER, Washington.

UNION CHURCH, January 17, 1899.

DEAR SIR: I notice your amendment to pension Confederate soldiers. There are but few of the old Confederate soldiers but what would gladly take a pension. Those that say they do not want it may not need it. * * * We went through the war and suffered, returning home with nothing. I have not heard any speak of it but think they should be pensioned. * * *

Why care so much for the dead that are scattered all over the country and do nothing for those that are alive? Many of the Confederate soldiers were buried at home. Are their graves going to be cared for, or are the towns the only ones to be noticed? I hope you will keep the fight up. I am sure our President would favor us with a pension.

Yours, with respect,

JOSEPH RIEBER.

Senator BUTLER, of North Carolina.

BROWNS SUMMIT, N. C., January 23, 1899.

DEAR SIR: I have noticed that some Confederate organizations have condemned your pension bill. Those organizations are not authorized to speak for the great body of ex-Confederates who move in the more humble walks of life. Comparatively few ex-Confederates who served in the ranks ever attend the meetings of those organizations, not having the means to do so, and have nothing to do with expressing the sentiments of those organizations. I have not heard a single ex-Confederate soldier speak of your bill who did not approve of it and commend you for introducing it. I do not believe that there is one ex Confederate soldier in North Carolina in five hundred that does not approve of your bill.

I served under Lee and Jackson.

Truly, yours,

F. G. CLICUTT.

Hon. MARION BUTLER, Senator.

WALTER, N. C., January 20, 1899.

DEAR SIR: I have seen in some of the papers that certain Confederate veterans were opposed to any aid from the General Government whatever. Now, the thought passed quickly through my mind that any and all such stuff was unauthorized by any considerable number of Confederate soldiers. The very great majority of the old soldiers had not heard of the amendment at the time these superfluous articles were published, and I would say that I have not conversed with a dozen of them yet that has heard tell of your proposed amendment.

I do not think I would put it wrong if I were to say one to ten that knows that such an amendment has been offered. The great majority of the little papers barely mentioned that such an amendment has been offered. Like everything new or that is much needed, these little papers are afraid to comment on such matters until they are worn threadbare by common conversation.

You know what class and what part of such class has tried to smother the amendment by such stuff as the Atlanta Constitution and other papers have printed. It is composed of men who never heard a gun fired to kill. * * * During the last twelve or fifteen years I have heard the pension matter discussed by old Confederate soldiers, and I have no recollection of ever having heard one of these soldiers say that he would oppose such generosity by the Federal Government.

The great majority of the old gray soldiers are in actual need of assistance and would hail the day when such could be their lot and part to be included among the lucky ones to be remembered by their country and Government.

In looking back a few years you can call to memory the Blair bill on the education of poor children of the South. The men that refused to let the little children of the South have an education by accepting it at the hands of the General Government will oppose anything that will relieve the old soldier of his suffering. This class of men will oppose anything that they can not handle to their own individual interest. * * *

Yours, truly,

J. H. CALDWELL.

Hon. MARION BUTLER,
United States Senator, Washington, D. C.

RALEIGH, N. C., January 20, 1899.

DEAR SIR: Through the newspapers I see that you have proposed an amendment to the pension bill to grant to Confederate soldiers a pension, which amendment we Tar Heels, or a large majority of us, do most heartily commend. We hope and trust in the Almighty God that you will be successful. It is nothing more than just, as we are all in the Union. I also see that some protests have been sent up against it. These protests were not sent up by the old battle-scarred and wounded men. It was done by those who are in bomb-proof positions; but there is not one of them but would be willing to receive it himself. * * * These are the sentiments of all that I have conversed with. I think it is the majority sentiment of other Southern States. If necessary to have a petition, I can get up one signed by five hundred with very little effort.

Yours, very truly,

JOHN R. HANCOCK.

Hon. MARION BUTLER.

MILLDALE, ALA., January 18, 1899.

DEAR SIR: As an old Confederate soldier I wish to thank you personally for your efforts to have the benefits of the United States pension laws extended to surviving Confederate soldiers. However much certain Confederate camps may pass resolutions against your proposition, the melancholy fact remains that there are quite a number of old rebs still on the tapis to whom such an allowance on the part of Congress would be not only a very gracious act, but it would also make a very acceptable addition to their daily "hog and hominy." The principle of the thing is not objectionable on any reasonable ground, unless Congress should discriminate against us by offering us a less pittance than Northern soldiers receive.

Yours, truly,

ROBERT S. OWEN,
Ex-First Sergeant, Company G, Fifty-first Alabama Regiment, Wheeler's Confederate Cavalry.

Hon. MARION BUTLER.

CAMP MCKENZIE, AUGUSTA, GA., January 19, 1899.

DEAR FRIEND: As such I will call you, though an entire stranger. The bold stand you have taken in defense of the ex-Confederate soldier commends you to the heart of every true Southern soldier who served and offered up his life for what he thought was right and his duty to his country and his home. It is now thirty-three years since he laid down his arms and returned to his home, to find nothing but want and poverty staring him in the face.

Since that time the majority of them have made but a scant living for themselves and families. When war was declared against Spain, the ex-Confederate soldiers and their sons were among the first to offer their services and rally around the flag and to offer their lives in defense of American honor and the banner of American freedom. I have talked with a great many old ex-Confederate soldiers since I have been here, and they all condemn those so-called meetings held by a few ex-Confederates and the resolutions they passed in regard to pensioning the needy Confederate soldiers, of which you know there are many.

Now, if these wealthy and independent ex-Confederates don't need any assistance from the United States Government, your bill will not force them to accept it. You are well aware that there are thousands of them needy, and would gladly accept any aid your bill would secure for them, let it be ever so small. Those men who are calling meetings and filing objections to pensioning old and broken-down Confederate soldiers have never had real want staring them in the face, but have held some lucrative office, either State or Federal, ever since the war closed. The Government can not deny, but must acknowledge, that the South to-day are just as loyal to the Union as the North, East, or West, and just as ready to lay down their lives as they were one hundred years ago in defense of what they accomplished.

I am an ex-Confederate soldier from Montgomery County, Md.; served in Col. E. V. White's cavalry during the war. I belonged to Company D, Capt. James Anderson, from Rockville, Md. I offered my services last June to Gen. Fitzhugh Lee. He could not accept me as an enlisted man, as I had passed the age limit. I went to Camp Alger and secured a place at headquarters train under Gen. M. C. Butler. * * * We ex-Confederates are all citizens of the United States. Though we served on the other side, we were not rebels, but true patriots; and we hope you will press your bill, and that Congress will show to the world that we are a united people.

Your friend,

N. F. HARRISS.

Hon. MARION BUTLER.

DEAR SIR: I see in the press that you have decided not to introduce your amendment to pension law on account of Confederate Veteran associations condemning the move you made. Now, I do not believe that there is any Confederate soldier, who has no political prejudice, who will condemn the movement. * * * I hope you will reconsider and at least get the opinion of Southern soldiers. I am satisfied that a large majority will favor the amendment. Some might say we have a soldiers' home. So we have. But will you require an old soldier to separate from his wife to get cared for at the home? Surely not. I know one personally who will suffer death before he will go to the soldiers' home and leave his wife. He could not afford to be less true to her than to his country.

I believe the Northern people will gladly agree, inasmuch as the South answered so promptly to the call in the Cuban war.

Yours, fraternally,

JNO. H. MOOSE.

DEAR SIR: Will you please send me a copy of the bill offered by you to pension Confederate soldiers? If your bill includes only those Confederates who were disabled by wounds I do not see what the Confederate camps have to do with it. I see from the papers that a few of these camps have protested against it. Some weeks since Corporal Tanner had a card in the Post of Washington in which he declared that every surviving Union soldier who had been shot down and had received one or more disabling wounds in battle would willingly have pensioned their brothers of the South who were afflicted the same way, for they realized how heavily handicapped those men are in the struggle for existence.

Yours, truly,

W. M. TALIFERRO.

Senator BUTLER.

SHELBY, TENN., January 4, 1899.

DEAR SENATOR: Since the statement was made through the press of your proposal to introduce an amendment to the pension bill for pensioning ex-Confederate soldiers, we have seen that some of the organizations of Confederates in the cities have opposed the proposition. As an ex-Confederate, and one who lost two brothers (myself disabled for life), I claim to be as true to the South as anyone. But I tell you that all of the one-legged, one-armed, and disabled soldiers are with you and bid you go ahead; and if you are successful or not, they will honor you for trying to help them in their old age.

Most of the soldiers belonging to the organizations I speak of are men well to do. They do not consider the condition of a large number of poor disabled Southern soldiers, living miserable lives in poorhouses or dependent on charity. Some of them get a small pittance from the States. Every ex-Federal soldier in this part of the country favors the pensioning of the Southern soldier. Gen. A. J. Vaughn, one of the most gallant soldiers, says the passing of the bill will be a blessing to the poor Confederates and the families dependent upon them.

So, in conclusion, will say I have a son in the Fourth Tennessee, now in Cuba, and so have other ex-Confederates, and we are a united people, and the poor, maimed, and crippled Confederate is one of us, and should receive kind treatment, as many are now too old to work. Any Senator or Congressman that can help you will see the day that he will be proud to know that he did something for the poor men who in their old age are now out upon the cold charity of this world.

Hoping I am not trespassing too much upon your time by this letter, I am, an ex-Confederate,

A. M. APPLEWHITE.

Orderly Sergeant, Company F, Eighteenth Mississippi Cavalry.

Hon. MARION BUTLER,
Washington, D. C.

RALEIGH, N. C., January 18, 1899.

DEAR SIR: I write you to correct some false impressions that are being made as to the attitude of Confederate soldiers in regard to the pension amendment offered by you. Now, the camps that have disapproved of it are of the cities and are dominated by politicians, but the privates are almost a unit for the amendment, which is an act of justice which I believe the soldiers of the North would accord by a large majority if they could vote on it now. The most of us are old and poor and needy. I hope you will stick to your amendment. I have consulted many old comrades around here and they are all for it. Not half of the members of the L. O. B. Branch were at the meeting that disapproved of it. God bless you and prosper you is the prayer of thousands of old soldiers.

Yours, truly,

C. MCG. DUNN.

Hon. MARION BUTLER,
Raleigh, N. C.

DEAR SIR: I saw some time ago that you had introduced a bill in Congress to pension Confederate soldiers. I have also seen several protests from different States. I do not know whether any of the protestants were ever in the war or not. I expect they all have some Government position is why they all seem so independent. I was in the Confederate service and was wounded several times, and served my country the best I knew how. I had no hand in bringing on the war, which was the case with the majority of the soldiers. I am not a beggar, but would appreciate any help that I could get, and I feel satisfied it is the case with the majority of the private soldiers.

Some people try to be very independent, especially when circumstances have placed them in some public position where they draw a lucrative salary. I can see nothing wrong in any Confederate soldier accepting a pension from the Government that we owe allegiance to, that we are loyal to, that we pay taxes to support, and that we stand ready to defend with our lives, as we did in the late war with Spain. Surely it is a matter of simple justice for Congress to pass your amendment. The most of the Confederate soldiers are poor men, and a pension would help them very much. Let me congratulate you on your effort to help the poor Confederate soldiers.

Yours, with kindest regards,

G. W. DUNN.

Hon. MARION BUTLER, Washington, D. C.

The following letter inclosed clippings from the Atlanta Constitution opposing the amendment:

DALTON, GA., January 19, 1899.

DEAR SIR: I call your attention to the within clippings from the Atlanta Constitution and ask you to not abandon your bill. The vast majority of Confederate States veterans feel as you do about it.

Give my compliments to Senator BATE and ask his cooperation in the name of one of his escorts in the civil war.

JOHN H. HILL.

Senator BUTLER.

STATE OF ARKANSAS, January 22, 1899.

DEAR SIR: Every old soldier who has lost a leg or an arm, and who is hobbling around upon a peg leg or crutches (as they are too poor to buy an artificial limb), are anxious for you to do all you can for them, and the majority of the Confederates will ever hold your name in grateful remembrance as the man that is now trying to help as brave lot of men as the sun ever shone upon. Some are living in poorhouses, others by charity.

These camps are composed of a lot of ex-Confederates that are able to take care of themselves. They are not of the poor, maimed class. They can talk about what they do not want, but if these same men were crippled and had to meet the hardships that these old, crippled, gray-headed soldiers are having in this cold world they would act differently. The needy Confederates are anxious for you to push your bill and hope for it to pass. They are now advanced in years, and every year they are becoming less able to support themselves, and it seems hard that while the Government is spending money to help the poor of other lands the poor ex-Confederate is left to work with one leg or one arm or starve. This is written at the request of over 50 old Confederates.

Respectfully, yours,

A. T. JONES,
Second Arkansas Confederate Regiment.

Hon. MARION BUTLER, Washington, D. C.

CASCADE, N. C., January 21, 1899.

MY DEAR SIR: I am glad to see that you have not abandoned your bill to pension the Confederate soldier. I know several here in Guilford County that are to-day in needy circumstances. These men actually need help. They are getting old; can't do much. So go on with your good work. The fighting old soldiers are with you to my own knowledge.

Yours, etc.,

O. C. WHEELER.

Hon. MARION BUTLER,
Washington, D. C.

The following letter inclosed a press clipping containing resolutions passed by a camp in Pulaski, Va., opposing the amendment:

PULASKI, VA., January 23, 1899.

DEAR SIR: Inclosed I hand you clipping from Pulaski News-Review. I do not think this represents the true sentiments of a large majority of the Confederate soldiers in this section. I think a large majority of the Confederate soldiers of this section would be glad to have pensions.

Yours, truly,

G. A. CALFEE,
An ex-Confederate.

Hon. MARION BUTLER,
United States Senate.

BERKLEY, VA., ——, —.

DEAR SIR: I see you propose a bill to pension the old Confederate soldier Well, there will have to be something done, and that soon. If you can not get us a pension, try to get a bill through to have all that are not able to work shot. There are two classes of old Confederate soldier in the South. The richer class try to run everything their own way, and in this way the old soldier that did the fighting stays at home while the Johnnie Reb that was in the bomb proof during the war runs the camps and passes resolutions to suit themselves and makes it appear that the old soldier is independent. You will find Lee's old veterans here in the poorhouse; men that charged the heights of Gettysburg. The old soldier is no longer a tool, and the sooner he dies the better it will be for the tinplate politician. He is only a thing of the past. * * * If you like, I will send you a list of veterans that are in favor of your bill.

Yours, truly,

B. F. GOSNEY.

The following is an extract from a letter to Hon. J. E. FOWLER, dated Clinton, N. C., January 23:

DEAR SIR: * * * It may be that some of the Confederate camps, chiefly composed of old Confederate officers, doctors, and other bomb-proof positions, are opposing the bill * * * but outside of those few, nine-tenths of the old soldiers would be heartily glad to accept any help the Congress could do to help them. * * * From conversation with many of them I know that they take no stock in the petitions of the camps, and that these do not represent them.

My own case is as follows: Wounded first at Antietam, wounded in the head, still troubling me; next wounded at Gettysburg in the left arm, bone shattered and still disabling me from manual labor; next, leg shot off at the Wilderness, and two more slight wounds, not important enough to specify.

Hoping that the bill can get through, notwithstanding the howl of the camps, I remain,

Yours, respectfully,

J. T. GREGORY.

RALEIGH, N. C., ——, —.

DEAR SIR: I see in some of the papers that you have introduced a bill in Congress to pension the Confederate soldiers. I also see that there have been some resolutions passed condemning your course in Congress for so doing. I have talked with some of the old soldiers about it and they think it would be nothing but right for the United States to pension Confederate soldiers, for the Southern States are not able to give them much. The men that have condemned your course are generally well-to-do, and do not need any pension to enable them to live, as they have a living anyhow. You go ahead and try to get your bill passed, and there will be thousands of old gray-haired veterans that will bless you.

J. R. MEDLIN,
Son of a Confederate Soldier.

Hon. MARION BUTLER, Washington, D. C.

COLUMBUS, GA., January 11, 1899.

DEAR SIR: We notice in to-day's Atlanta Constitution, page 3, the announcement: "BUTLER will abandon his bill and will yield to the wishes of the Confederate veterans."

May we, the undersigned Confederate veterans, hereby specially request you not to abandon your bill for the United States to pension the Confederate veterans. Because we are citizens of this great Government, were born in one of the States composing said Government, were born under the Stars and Stripes, and by the blessings of a kind Providence we are living under said flag, and are now and have heretofore done our duty to our State and the Government under said flag, and yield to no one a greater love for that flag and this Government that ourselves.

It is true that when our State conceived that we were deprived of our rights under its Constitution and as proposed to be administered in 1861, by solemn convention our State passed the ordinance of secession, and the Northern States endeavored to coerce us to remain in the Union in which our constitutional rights had been violated; our State and other States endeavored to form another Confederacy in which we might be all on an equality; then an appeal to arms was the result, and we, as in duty bound, enlisted under the new Confederacy and fought for what we conceived to be constitutional freedom and the "inviolable" State rights. It was a war between the States and not a rebellion, and as an evidence of that fact not a Confederate soldier nor leader could be convicted of treason, and the Union was restored by restoring the States to their places, on equal footing, back into the Union. Our Government, thus reunited after a war between the States, presented to the world a reunited Government with the Union as "inviolable," and the perpetuity of State rights and constitutions also as "inviolable."

Wherefore, when President McKinley, in the hour of his welcome to our hearts and homes, in beholding our loyalty to that Government he so ably represents as "Our President," as well as the President of the other sections of this Government, announced the hope "that the time has arrived for the United States Government to do justice to the dead heroes and the living veterans of the several States who fought for what they conceived to be their constitutional rights under the secession ordinances of their several States," our hearts respond in unity to his sentiments and one that proclaimed him a "true patriot;" and in our innermost souls there went up a rejoicing that at last God had raised up a man who is not afraid to speak the "truth," and one who did not fear to speak his convictions.

Wherefore we hope you will press your bill and hope Congress will pass the same, and by so doing show to the world that we are a reunited people. We desire this, not as "mendicants for pensions," but in response to the grand and patriotic sentiments of our President, and as voicing the sentiments of every true patriot who loves his whole country and respects the valor of the dead Confederate soldiers as a brother of a united country.

So we ask you to press your bill to a successful issue, and may the God of peace bless you and our whole country.

Respectfully, your fellow-citizens,

MARTIN VAN BUREN COOK,
GRIGSBY E. THOMAS,
And fifty-three others.

Hon. MARION BUTLER,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. President, if the States which believed and contended that they had a constitutional right to withdraw from the Union are to be taxed to pension the soldiers of those States which believed that we had no such constitutional right, then surely those States should not object, and I do not believe they would object if their sentiment were tested, to being taxed to help us pension our Confederate soldiers. The South has been pensioning them, Mr. President, and taxing its citizens in nearly every Southern State up to the constitutional limit to do it.

But still the Confederate soldier, I am sorry to say, is too poorly provided for. It touches the heart of every Northern soldier when he goes South and meets a one-armed Confederate soldier and sees the struggle that he is making to make a living and pay his burden of taxes, and the result is that everyone expresses himself as wishing that his Government could pay to him—the Confederate soldier—the same pension it pays to the Northern soldier. Every Northern soldier admires the courage, bravery, and heroism displayed by the Confederate soldier. He is now proud to fight by his side, and I know he does not want any discrimination made between them.

Mr. CHANDLER. Will the Senator allow me a word?

Mr. BUTLER. Certainly.

Mr. CHANDLER. I have no doubt that the Union soldiers of the North have the most kindly sentiments toward their late brethren in arms. The war has been over for about the third of a century, and the Union soldiers would undoubtedly be willing to have any reasonable testimonial of regard set on foot in recognition of the bravery of the Confederate soldiers in that great historic conflict.

The difficulty with me, Mr. President, is to discover a theory, a justifiable theory, in the face of the country and in the face of the world, upon which the United States Government could give pensions from the public Treasury, money raised by taxation from the people, to Confederate soldiers who had been in arms for the destruction of the Government which has given the pension.

Mr. BUTLER. I protest against the Senator's language. If he had been here and had heard me, I think he would not have used it.

Mr. CHANDLER. I do not insist upon the expression. I do not know what language the Senator objects to, but I withdraw it, whatever it is. I only——

Mr. BUTLER. That the Southern soldiers took up arms to destroy the Government. I have tried to show by facts and argument that that was not the case. I have devoted half of my speech to it.

Mr. CHANDLER. I do labor under the disadvantage of not having heard the theory upon which the Senator would do this thing. I should like to have him, if it is not disagreeable to him, restate the theory upon which a Senator can vote to pension a Confederate soldier.

Several SENATORS. No, no.

Mr. CHANDLER. I am in entire sympathy, if the Senator will allow me, with the sentiment which led the President of the United States to say that the nation might assume the care of the Confederate cemeteries, because that is a mere testimonial to the bravery of those men and their courage, however wrong they may have been in the cause for which they fought. It is a testimonial to that bravery which is the common heritage of the whole American people. But how can we pay them pensions when a pension is a reward for military service performed for the country? In spite of the suggestions which appear to come to me to the contrary, I do ask the Senator to restate the theory upon which he thinks I could give a vote to pension Confederate soldiers.

Mr. BUTLER. The Senator has himself, unwittingly, probably, stated the case and the reason as strong as I can do it, when he states that the courage and bravery and heroism displayed on every battlefield by the Southern soldiers is to-day a part of the common heritage of this country; that it stands to-day for its common defense against every foreign foe, equal with that of the Northern soldier.

Mr. CHANDLER. But let me ask the Senator right there, if we should actually pay pensions to Confederate soldiers, would it not tend to encourage another rebellion at some time?

Mr. BUTLER. The Senator surely is jesting. There is not a man, North or South, who expects another such war ever to happen or who believes it can happen. I took some pains to show, in the early part of my remarks, that the other one could not have happened if we had been living under a perpetual compact.

Mr. CHANDLER. And does the Senator say it is impossible that there shall ever be another civil war of this kind?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from New Hampshire should address the Chair and obtain leave through the Chair to interrupt the Senator from North Carolina.

Mr. CHANDLER. With great respect to the Chair, I made an important omission. Now, I should like the Senator from North Carolina to yield, if the Chair will secure me permission.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from North Carolina yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. BUTLER. I yielded to the Senator for a question. Now I will answer it, if he is ready.

Mr. CHANDLER. Is it in order for the Senator to answer it, as I had asked it before obtaining the permission of the Chair? If it is, I should like him to do so.

Mr. BUTLER. I understand the Senator's question to be whether I think there can ever be another civil war between the States. I answer, No; there will never be another conflict between sovereign States fighting over their constitutional reserved rights. No one can have any doubt on that point.

Mr. CHANDLER. Mr. President——

Mr. BUTLER. There is no cause why any member of this body should have ever made the suggestion; but since the Senator has asked the question, that is my answer to it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from North Carolina yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. BUTLER. Certainly.

Mr. CHANDLER. The only other idea I wish to present to the Senator, with all respect, is this: Shall we not be more likely, if there is danger of civil war in this country, to have that war break out if it is understood that pensions will be given, after the war is over, to both sides? [Laughter.]

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. President, the class of citizens that could be moved by motives so low as those that seem to haunt the Senator are happily so few and insignificant in number, even if they exist at all, that neither they nor the question call for consideration. The Senator should not jest about so serious a matter.

Mr. CHANDLER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from North Carolina yield?

Mr. CHANDLER. I beg pardon for having been so unfortunate as to irritate the Senator. I only wanted to illuminate his argument by certain logical suggestions.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. President, it is a suggestion that ought to irritate an American citizen. It is a justifiable cause of irritation, and loudly every American citizen will resent the suggestion.

Now, Mr. President, as to the theory, the Senator wants to find in the Constitution some clause written in plain language to show how the Government can pay a pension as a tribute to heroism and bravery and courage exhibited by the Southern soldier such as was never surpassed in the history of the world. Go and look in the Constitution and show me some clause for denying them their constitutional rights and I will show you the clause that will justify you in pensioning them.

Mr. President, at Appomattox, when we amended the Constitution and started out under a new compact, there was and is ample provision in it for pensioning the Confederate soldiers. Has any Southern soldier ever been tried for treason? Who has ever dared to try one for treason? He could not have been convicted in any court in this land. There is not a part of the North, or a corner of it, so prejudiced against the South that you could have found a court in which you could have convicted a single Southern soldier. Under the circumstances there can be no constitutional objection.

Mr. President, shall the South be longer treated in the least respect as conquered territory from which taxes are to be collected, which, unfortunately, since there is discrimination in their distribution, appear too much as punitive taxation? Should the Government treat its own citizens less justly than it treats a vanquished foreign foe? Have we forced even Spain to pay a war indemnity and left her soldiers and sailors to tramp home? On the other hand, we pay her $20,000,000 as a bounty with which she can pension her soldiers and sailors for many years.

If the Senator from New Hampshire has such conscientious scruples about how to pay pensions to Confederate soldiers, then let the North pay the South for its property that was taken from it by the war, and distribute the money to the States, and each State then will be amply able with the funds to take care of its Confederate soldiers until the last one is dead.

Mr. CHANDLER. Mr. President——

Mr. BUTLER. We never have taken territory or property from any foreign country without paying for it, even when we have gone to war with such provocation as there was in the sinking of the Maine in Havana Harbor.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from North Carolina yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. BUTLER. Certainly.

Mr. CHANDLER. I should like to have the Senator state upon what principle this nation could pay the South for the property which was destroyed by the Union armies in the course of the rebellion, which is his present suggestion?

Mr. BUTLER. Whenever the Senator explains on what theory we are to pay Spain $20,000,000 for keeping her from getting whipped by the Filipinos, I will answer his question.

Mr. CHANDLER. I leave that to the Senators from Massachusetts. [Laughter.]

Mr. BUTLER. This Government has very properly, and the North indorsed it, very much to its credit, agreed to a proposition to pay back to the South the direct land taxes. It was a just measure. It did not humiliate the South to receive it. It was not unconstitutional to do it.

Mr. CHANDLER. That whole tax was paid back. It was not only remitted to the Southern States, but it was paid back to the Northern States. That is no principle to justify a victorious nation in paying for the property destroyed by its armies in suppressing the rebellion.

Mr. BUTLER. Then the point I made was that we recognized the principle that there should be no discrimination between the North and the South on account of the war. We recognized that principle when we returned those taxes. My whole position today is based on exactly that contention.

Mr. President, happily, sectional prejudice is passing away, and if any traces of it continue to exist it is no doubt due to this continued discrimination more than to any other cause. Therefore, to wipe out the last shadow or excuse for sectional prejudice, and to cement together more thoroughly every section of this country into one harmonious and united people, I proposed this amendment.

I believed it was right then and I believe it is right now; but since there has appeared a division of sentiment, and not desiring to do anything to cause in the least any sectional discussion, and not wishing in the least to be a party to proposing or insisting upon a vote on a measure which would embarrass any considerable number of people from my own section—in view of these considerations, strongly as I believe in the justice of the measure, I will not press it at this time.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, and read the third time.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is, Shall the bill pass?

Mr. PERKINS. I am informed by the senior Senator from Maryland [Mr. GORMAN], by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. COCKRELL], and others, that they desire to speak upon the pending bill, and, therefore, I will ask that it go over until the morning hour to-morrow.

Mr. COCKRELL. The bill has not been yet passed, has it?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill has been read a third time, and the question is on its passage.

Mr. COCKRELL. I move to reconsider the vote by which it was ordered to a third reading.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The final question will be on the passage of the bill.

Mr. LODGE. The bill has not been passed.

Mr. BERRY. The bill is still open to debate.

Mr. PERKINS. I understand the bill is still open for discussion?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is.

Mr. PERKINS. I will therefore ask unanimous consent that the bill go over and be taken up immediately after the routine morning business to-morrow.

Mr. HOAR. Mr. President, I rise to a parliamentary inquiry. What is the precise parliamentary condition of the bill?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill has been read a third time, and the question is on its passage.

Mr. HOAR. The bill is then in the Senate, and the question I wish to ask is whether it is open to amendment?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is not.

Mr. HOAR. That is what I supposed.

Mr. BATE. Mr. President, I was not aware, because of the confusion in the Chamber, that the amendment proposed by the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. BUTLER] to the bill had been withdrawn immediately on his finishing his speech. I am very glad now to learn that it is withdrawn, but I do not know that I ought to let it pass, after the very elaborate speech of the Senator from North Carolina, without a brief statement. I have no criticism to make upon that part of his speech or anything connected with it in relation to the rights of the States to secede and their course thereafter. There were many things said by him that are historic truths and can not be too often said.

But, Mr. President, I have been in the receipt of letters, telegrams, and resolutions adopted by ex-Confederate soldiers in their camps and bivouacs that give a different version touching this resolution than that put upon it in the speech of the Senator from North Carolina. He would have you believe they approved of his resolution and were knocking at the door of Congress asking for pensions. I wish in a few words to put them in their true light, for they are a brave, noble, patriotic, self-sacrificing set of men. They are not alms-begging nor pension-seeking men. They are proud, poor, and patriotic, and ask no pensions of the Government. Neither have they any apology to make. They are proud of their history, and we—for I am one of them—intend to preserve our history intact. I have never apologized, and never expect to, for my course as a Confederate soldier. I believed I was right, and I believe it now.

Indeed, Mr. President, I am glad to know that many of those who fought us bravest and hardest are among our best friends and greatest admirers. They have risen above prejudice and calmly look at the truth of history. The Confederate history is exceptional and unique. It is a distinctive feature, and we shall not mar, but preserve it as it has been made. We ask no pensions of the Government that by superior numbers and resources exhausted us and then overcame us.

I think there is no considerable number of ex-Confederate soldiers anywhere in our Southland who have either sought or will seek pensions of the Government. It is true I can not speak for all, but I am constantly brought in contact with a great many of them, especially in Tennessee, who, in part, I have the honor to speak for in this Chamber, and I feel assured they do not favor the resolution of the Senator. In evidence of this I beg to read one of the resolutions which have come to my colleague and myself from our State as a specimen of how our Confederate bivouacs and camps feel touching this matter of pensions by the United States Government to ex-Confederate soldiers. It is a specimen of others sent us, and being short and directly to the point made in this resolution, and relates to the resolution itself, besides putting the Confederate soldier right on the record, I read it. The resolution came addressed to me, and it is as follows:

CLARKSVILLE, TENN., January 18, 1899.

At the last meeting of Forbes Bivouac the following resolution was passed unanimously, with the request that our Senators read the same to the Senate:

"Resolved, That Forbes Bivouac condemns in most unmeasured terms the resolution offered by Senator BUTLER, of North Carolina, seeking to pension the ex-Confederate soldiers; and

"Resolved further, That we do not recognize in him one who has any right to voice the sentiment of a Confederate soldier."

CLAY STACKER,
Secretary Forbes Bivouac.

I have no criticism to make upon the motive that actuated the Senator in offering the resolution, nor on what he said as to the constitutional rights of the States. I think the Confederate soldier feels that he has had to pay a great deal, and a great deal too much, for Federal pensions. He does not approve of it. But this question of claiming pension from the Federal Government comes home to him and he does not want "dirty dollars," after making the history he has and fighting the battles he has, to come to him from the enemy whom he fought. No, no, Mr. President; that is a mistake. It is unlike the patriotic, brave, self-sacrificing soldier who fought under our Confederate flag. For those I have the honor to speak for, I discard the idea, I spurn the proposition; I have neither seen nor heard of one who approves of it. They have struggled through the war without money; they have overcome their misfortunes, and will not now go back on the cause for which they fought; they hold it too sacred for barter.

But, Mr. President, you have no more loyal men in council or under the flag of our country than those who were Confederates. Very late and recent events have satisfied all of that. I do not, however, wish to make any speech on this. The Confederate soldier needs no laudation at my hands, and I do not propose to give it; but I want to see that he is set right, that he is not put in the false attitude of knuckling and kneeling before the country, and asking here for pensions for having done his duty to his State and the constitution of his country while a Confederate soldier. The ex-Confederate soldier of to-day is no suppliant, but an open, manly challenger of justice and the truth of history.

We have taken care of our Confederate dead. We did that by our own contributions. The noble women of our country raised most of the money in their own sweet way, and we have, through these charitable channels, buried them in cemeteries and cared for them by our own people. We have raised monuments to them all over our Southland, and I hope that such monuments will multiply and may become higher and higher, and that there may be more and more of them erected every year. But, sir, while we have done this, we respect ourselves, and I say we do not propose to come and ask this Government to give us pensions now. And be assured we will be as loyal to it as those who receive pensions for fighting on the Federal side of our great interstate war. Our brave old Confederate soldiers ask no pensions of the Federal Government.

You will remember, Mr. President, that our States have taken this matter in hand. My State gives $60,000 or $80,000 a year, and other States are doing the same thing. They have picked out the old, lame, and maimed Confederate soldiers, those who are suffering from the most severe disabilities and those who most need aid, and we have taken care of them.

I appreciate the sentiment of the Senator from North Carolina and do not wish in the slightest to criticise his motives, which are undoubtedly the best; but I think his amendment is unfortunate. I think he has taken the right course in withdrawing it, and I am glad that he has done so.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from California [Mr. PERKINS] asks unanimous consent that the pending bill may be considered immediately after the conclusion of the morning business to-morrow. Is there objection. The Chair hears none, and that order will be made.

Mr. PETTUS. Mr. President, it was my purpose to say a few words about this debate which has arisen here on an amendment to the pending pension appropriation bill.

I hope that no Senator on this floor will attempt to renew the war, which closed at Appomatox, as the Confederate soldiers generally believe; and that is a belief on which they have ever since acted loyally to this Government.

Mr. President, the war was settled then. All of us agreed that it was settled. I had myself some little knowledge of that war; and we all agreed that it was settled and ended. For the Lord's sake, Senators, let us have it ended, and not renewed here on this floor. It is to the benefit of no State, no county, no individual in this Union; it is to the prejudice of every one of us to have that war again renewed; and I hope it never will be done.

Mr. GALLINGER. I move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 6 o'clock and 21 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Friday, January 27, 1899, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THURSDAY, January 26, 1899.

The House met at 12 o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. HENRY N. COUDEN.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

RECORDS OF THE UNION AND CONFEDERATE ARMIES.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Mr. Speaker, I desire to present a conference report, and I ask that House concurrent resolution No. 36 with Senate amendment be read, and then I will say a word.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Concurrent resolution.

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That the Secretary of War is hereby authorized and directed to furnish one complete set of the Official Records of the Union and Confederate Armies to each Senator, Representative, and Delegate of the Fifty-fifth Congress not already entitled by law to receive the same; and he is further authorized to use for this purpose such incomplete sets as remain unsold or uncalled for by the beneficiaries designated to receive them under the authority contained in the several acts of Congress providing for the distribution and sale of this publication: Provided, That the Secretary of War may call upon the Public Printer to print and bind such parts of said work as will enable him to complete the sets herein provided for.

The amendment of the Senate is as follows:

The provision in the "Act making appropriations for the sundry civil expenses of the Government," approved August 5, 1892, providing for the printing and binding of 500 copies of the Official Records of the War of the Rebellion for the use of Senators, Members, and Delegates of the Fifty-second Congress, shall not be construed to prevent the binding of any public document which would otherwise be provided for by the "Act providing for the public printing and binding and the distribution of public documents," approved January 12, 1895, which provides "that each Senator and Representative shall be entitled to the binding in half morocco, or material no more expensive, of but one copy of each public document to which he may be entitled."

The conference report is as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the Senate to the House concurrent resolution No. 36, in regard to printing and binding of the Official Records of the Union and Confederate Armies, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate, and agree to the same.

GEO. D. PERKINS,
JAMES D. RICHARDSON,
Managers on the part of the House.
H. C. LODGE,
A. P. GORMAN,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

The statement is as follows:

The resolution as it passed the House provided for the supplying of members of the Fifty-fifth Congress who were not already entitled by law to receive the same a complete set of the Official Records of the Union and Confederate Armies.

The Senate amended the resolution by providing that the resolution should not interfere with the privilege or right of members to have binding done at the Government Printing Office under existing law. The House disagreed to this Senate amendment, and the conference committee was appointed. As the resolution did not, in the opinion of the House conferees, interfere with this privilege and was not intended to have any such effect, the House conferees have agreed to recommend that the House recede from its disagreement to the Senate amendment and to recommend that said amendment be agreed to.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Mr. Speaker, one word by way of explanation. The statement explains fully the condition and situation, but it is a fact that the original resolution and the amendment of the Senate were lost, and these papers simply supply the lost papers; and I ask unanimous consent that they may be accepted as originals. They have been carefully gone over and they are identical with the original resolutions. I hope they will be substituted for the originals and that the conference report be agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee asks unanimous consent, the original papers having been lost, that the copies sent to the Clerk's desk may be substituted in all respects for them. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The question is on agreeing to the conference report.

The conference report was agreed to.

On motion of Mr. RICHARDSON, a motion to reconsider the vote whereby the conference report was agreed to was laid on the table.

REORGANIZATION OF THE ARMY.

Mr. HULL. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 11022) for the reorganization of the Army, and for other purposes.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, with Mr. PAYNE in the chair, for the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 11022) for the reorganization of the Army, and for other purposes.

Mr. HULL. Mr. Chairman, I yield one hour, or so much as he may require, to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MARSH].

Mr. JETT. Before the gentleman from Illinois proceeds, I should like to inquire how much time is remaining on this side of the House?

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk informs the Chair that there are remaining on the gentleman's side two hours and four minutes.

Mr. COX. Mr. Chairman, I want to make an inquiry in this connection. As a member of the committee, I was entitled to an hour, and when I spoke I requested the Chair to stop me when I had occupied forty minutes. My purpose was to yield to two of my colleagues ten minutes each. Now I wish to understand whether I have the right to do so.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks the gentleman would not have the right unless time was yielded to him by the gentleman from New York [Mr. SULZER], because the House ordered that the time should be equally divided, the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HULL] to control the time on one side and the gentleman from New York on the other.

Mr. COX. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. HULL. Mr. Chairman, is this coming out of the time I have yielded to the gentleman from Illinois?

The CHAIRMAN. Certainly not; the gentleman from Illinois is entitled to an hour.

Mr. HULL. All I want is that the time occupied by this "free and easy" shall not be charged to us.

Mr. COX. Mr. Chairman, I made my proposition when I was recognized as plainly as I could make it, that I would yield a part of my time for the benefit of my colleagues.

The CHAIRMAN. If the gentleman from New York should yield to the gentleman from Tennessee, of course the time would be within the disposal of the gentleman from Tennessee, unless objected to by some member of the House.

Mr. COX. The gentleman from New York did not yield to me; I had my own time.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman is mistaken. The House has ordered that the time be equally divided between the two sides, and that the gentleman from New York control the time on the side of the House to which the gentleman from Tennessee belongs.

Mr. CARMACK. I understood—and I think my colleagues will bear out my statement—that my colleague [Mr. COX] was given an hour, and that he stated at the beginning of his remarks his desire to talk only forty minutes and yield the rest of his time.

Mr. COX. Yes, sir.

Mr. CARMACK. My colleague made that statement when he opened his remarks.

Mr. COX. When I was recognized in my own right for an hour I kept back part of that time for the benefit of two of my colleagues.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understood that when the gentleman from Tennessee addressed the House and concluded his remarks, he did not reserve any time.

Mr. COX. I did; and the RECORD shows it.

The CHAIRMAN. The RECORD will show what was the fact.

Mr. COX. Yes, sir; and I reserved twenty minutes of my hour.

Mr. HULL. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. HAY addressed the Chair.

Mr. HULL. I do not want to take my friend from Virginia [Mr. HAY] off his feet.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks the time of the House ought not to be occupied now with a discussion of this kind.

Mr. HULL. My understanding is that the RECORD will show the facts in regard to this matter, and that we are using now time that ought to be devoted to debate. I yield an hour, or so much as he may need, to my colleague on the committee, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MARSH].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois is recognized.

Mr. HAY. Before the gentleman from Illinois proceeds I desire to make a statement in regard to the time.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MARSH] yield?

Mr. HAY. I do not wish to take any of the gentleman's time.

Mr. COX. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee rises to a parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. COX. I announced as distinctly as I could what I proposed to do and asked the Chair and the timekeeper to call me down when I had occupied forty minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understands that the gentleman did make that announcement.

Mr. COX. And I was called down.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair would state to the gentleman from Tennessee that he can raise this question when the time comes back to his side of the House; and in the meantime the record can be looked up. The Chair thinks there will be no difficulty in settling this matter.

Mr. HAY. I wish to make a statement, with the consent of the gentleman from Iowa.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois is occupying the floor; does he yield?

Mr. HAY. I do not wish to take any of the time of the gentleman from Illinois. I wish simply to make the statement that the gentleman from New York [Mr. SULZER] who has been authorized to control the time on our side of the House asked me in his absence to control the time, and therefore I am doing so. I desire my position in that regard to be understood. That is all.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the Chair will recognize it. The gentleman from Illinois will proceed.

Mr. MARSH. Mr. Chairman, the discussion on this bill has wandered very widely from the bill itself; and if the House will have patience with me, I will occupy but a few minutes of its time in calling its attention to what I believe to be some very important provisions in the bill that ought to be modified. But before proceeding further, Mr. Chairman, I send to the Clerk's desk and ask to have read, as a part of my own remarks, an extract from the message of the President of the United States, sent to this House at the beginning of this session.

The Clerk read as follows:

Under the act of Congress approved April 20, 1898, authorizing the President in his discretion, "upon a declaration of war by Congress, or a declaration by Congress that war exists," I directed the increase of the Regular Army to the maximum of 62,000, authorized in said act.

There are now in the Regular Army 57,852 officers and men. In said act it was provided, "That at the end of any war in which the United States may become involved the Army shall be reduced to a peace basis by the transfer in the same arm of the service or absorption by promotion or honorable discharge under such regulations as the Secretary of War may establish of supernumerary commissioned officers and the honorable discharge or transfer of supernumerary enlisted men; and nothing contained in this act shall be construed as authorizing the permanent increase of the commissioned or enlisted force of the Regular Army beyond that now provided by the law in force prior to the passage of this act, except as to the increase of 25 majors provided for in section 1 hereof."

The importance of legislation for the permanent increase of the Army is therefore manifest, and the recommendation of the Secretary of War for that purpose has my unqualified approval. There can be no question that at this time, and probably for some time in the future, 100,000 men will be none too many to meet the necessities of the situation. At all events, whether that number shall be required permanently or not, the power should be given to the President to enlist that force if in his discretion it should be necessary; and the further discretion should be given him to recruit for the Army within the above limit from the inhabitants of the islands with the government of which we are charged.

It is my purpose to muster out the entire Volunteer Army as soon as the Congress shall provide for the increase of the regular establishment. This will be only an act of justice and will be much appreciated by the brave men who left their homes and employments to help the country in its emergency.

Mr. MARSH. Mr. Chairman, that portion of the President's message was, by the order of the House, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and in pursuance of and in response to that portion of the message your committee has reported and now presents for your consideration the pending bill. I do not understand, sir, that the committee considers that bill as perfect in all of its details. It is reported here by that committee with its recommendation, and of course it is for this House to determine whether all of its provisions are wise or unwise.

As a member of that committee, I wish to state that I distinctly reserved the right as a member of the committee to propose amendments or to oppose features of this bill as I might deem best when the matter was before the House. The main object of the committee is—or at least it ought to be—to supply to the President of the United States the increased strength of the Army that he calls for and deems necessary at this time, and I am in perfect harmony and in perfect accord with the President in his desire to have an increase in the Regular Army. He says:

At all events—

Quoting from the message—

whether that number (100,000 men) will be required permanently or not, the power should be given to the President to enlist that force if, in his discretion, it should be necessary.

I am willing and anxious and desirous of conferring upon the President of the United States the right and the power to exercise, according to his best judgment, that power to increase the Army to 100,000 men, or to 75,000 men, or to 60,000 men, or to any other number, not exceeding 100,000 men, such as his own judgment may dictate. I am not prepared to say to this House, I am not satisfied or sufficiently informed to enable me to say to the House, that the country now needs an increase in the Regular Army to 100,000 men.

But, Mr. Chairman, I am prepared to say that I am willing to leave that question absolutely and entirely in the hands of the President.

Mr. COX. Will my colleague on the committee allow me just here——

Mr. MARSH. I would prefer to proceed now.

Mr. COX. Only a word on this point.

Mr. MARSH. I must decline to be interrupted.

Mr. COX. All right, if the gentleman declines.

Mr. MARSH. Mr. Chairman, knowing full well that the President of the United States will not increase that army to the extent of one single enlisted man or one commissioned officer beyond what he may deem absolutely necessary under the responsibilities that rest upon his shoulders, I am willing to intrust this power to him; and hence when we get into the consideration of the bill under the five-minutes rule I shall offer an amendment to the bill giving to the President discretionary power to increase the Army to 100,000 men, or less, according to his own judgment.

As the bill now reads it leaves no discretion with the President. As the bill has been prepared it makes it mandatory and obligatory upon him to increase the Army to about 100,000 men, whether he deems that increase necessary or does not deem it necessary. When peace shall have been declared, the Regular Army will consist of 26,610 enlisted men, and it will take weeks and months—a gradual process—to increase that number to 100,000 men. And I will say that while that process is going on it should go no further than the judgment of the President deems to be wise and proper and for the best interests of the country.

Under the existing law—or under the proposed bill, I should say—five new infantry regiments must be added to the Regular Army, and the necessary officers appointed to command them must be commissioned by the President, whether he needs them or not. Under the provisions of the pending bill, if it becomes a law, it becomes mandatory upon the President of the United States to appoint these additional officers for the infantry or the additional officers required for the artillery, and also the additional, the numberless, officers in the various staff departments of the Army.

Now, sir, I would leave to the President of the United States absolute power in this regard. I would leave him untrammeled. I would leave it to his judgment whether that increase should be made or not, as he shall think necessary for the best interests of the country; and he has indicated his views in his message to the House, in which he says:

> At all events, whether that number shall be required permanently or not, power should be given to the President to enlist that force if, in his discretion, it should be necessary.

And I want to say, Mr. Chairman, further, that this bill largely increases the staff department or bureaus of the Army, an increase that may be necessary if we have a force of 100,000 men in the Regular Army, as proposed by the bill, but which will be unnecessary if we are to have an army of 60,000 or 70,000 men. Yet under this bill this staff will be created and must be created; these officers must be promoted and commissioned and new ones appointed to fill the vacancies at the bottom. There is no discretion left in the President; but we undertake now to say in this bill to the President that he must provide an army of 100,000 men, whether he needs it or whether the country does not need it.

I would leave the discretion with the President. The country has confidence in his judgment. The country has confidence in his patriotism. The House can not but have confidence in his judgment, a judgment which I propose to have him exercise during the coming months after Congress shall have adjourned on the 4th day of March next. And in proposing this amendment, and in making this suggestion, I want to say to the House that I am speaking in harmony with the wishes of the President himself. I violate no confidence when I say that in two recent conversations with him he has said to me that he would not recruit a soldier nor add an officer to the Army unless he deemed it to be necessary.

In that conversation the President said to me that he thought Congress ought to be willing to trust him as to whether the Army should go up to 100,000 men or whether it should go to a less number, and that he would not add a single man nor a single officer nor a single organization unless at the time he deemed it to be necessary. Hence I trust that when we come to consider this bill under the five-minute rule the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs and the members of this House will agree to an amendment relieving this bill from its mandatory character and conferring upon the President the discretionary power as to how fully he shall carry it into operation.

Mr. COX. Will the gentleman yield to me for a question now?

Mr. MARSH. Certainly, for a question.

Mr. COX. Let us get the point down.

Mr. MARSH. Put the question, my friend.

Mr. COX. I am going to put it. You wish to leave the President the power to organize the Regular Army to the limit of 100,000 men?

Mr. MARSH. Substantially.

Mr. COX. If that is true, why not confer upon the President the power to extend the Army to any number he wants?

Mr. MARSH. Mr. Chairman, if this bill becomes a law as it now stands it is mandatory on the President. He must appoint all the thousands of officers that it provides for, whether at the time he deems them necessary or not. This simply puts it in his discretion as to whether it shall be increased to the full extent or only part way. Why not confer upon him that discretion? Are you afraid that he will not make the Army large enough? Are you afraid that he will make it too small? My friend from Tennessee does not want a large army.

Mr. COX. No.

Mr. MARSH. This provision of mine relieves the President from the obligation imposed by the bill in its present form to make an army of a hundred thousand, and he can stop with 60,000 if he chooses, and he may stop in the appointment of the large number of officers provided for in this bill. He may stop halfway. I say, let him have that power. From that I will pass on to another point.

Mr. COX. Pardon me right there for one moment, for I am not going to interrupt except——

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Illinois yield to the gentleman from Tennessee?

Mr. MARSH. Why, I must yield to my good friend from Tennessee, although he knows he is taking my time.

Mr. COX. I will give you all mine.

Mr. MARSH. You have given yours away already.

Mr. COX. I will borrow some more somewhere else.

Mr. MARSH. Very well.

Mr. COX. I know what my friend's idea is, but I want the House to understand it. If you are going to confer upon the President of the United States the power to call out a certain number of troops, why do you limit him at all? Why put the limit at 100,000?

Mr. MARSH. Mr. Chairman, we limit him to a hundred thousand, because nobody believes that the Army, under any circumstances, will need to be larger than a hundred thousand men, and it is supposed by a great many people that we shall not need a hundred thousand. Hence, I do not want to provide absolutely in the law that the Army must be composed of 100,000 men. We placed a limit upon the number of volunteers, in the volunteer act last spring, if I recollect right, not to exceed 500,000 men. The President called out 175,000.

Mr. COX. I beg my friend's pardon. That bill does not limit him.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Illinois yield?

Mr. MARSH. No, I do not want to yield.

Mr. COX. I know the gentleman does not want to make an incorrect statement.

Mr. MARSH. No, I do not want to.

Mr. COX. Another thing——

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee is not in order. The gentleman from Illinois declines to yield.

Mr. MARSH. I hope my friend from Tennessee will allow me to proceed.

Mr. COX. I hope my friend will correct the statement that he has made.

The CHAIRMAN. The committee will be in order.

Mr. MARSH. Now, Mr. Chairman, in the organization of the infantry companies under the present law, 106 enlisted men are provided to each infantry company. The 106 enlisted men include the privates and noncommissioned officers. This bill increases the number of the enlisted men of an infantry company to 145. I hope at the proper time, when we get into consideration of the bill under the five-minute rule, to move an amendment reducing that number from 145 to the present number, 106. Under the present mode of handling troops, fighting necessarily in open order, instead of close order, 145 men are too many for a company commander to command. Under the old system of war, such as General HENDERSON and my friend Colonel COX were engaged in, the companies were formed in compact order. We formed even in three and four lines and charged in columns of brigades and columns of divisions in close order. The men touched elbow to elbow. That mode of warfare has passed, and the fighting now is done upon the front line, with the men 5, 6, and 8 and 10 feet apart.

Mr. HULL. Will it interrupt my friend to ask him a question?

Mr. MARSH. Not at all.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield to the gentleman from Iowa?

Mr. HULL. Is it not true that the open order of fighting——

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. HULL. The gentleman yielded to me. I say that in order that the gentleman may elaborate it somewhat at this time, is it not true that the open formation of the modern organization of infantry in the German army has increased the number in the company in place of decreasing it?

Mr. MARSH. Mr. Chairman, the German law provides 250 for the company. There are reasons for it there that do not obtain here. In my time I do not care to discuss it here. I want to say what I ought to have said a while ago—that the Committee on Military Affairs had hearings before the recess, and reported this bill just before the recess was taken. We had before us that accomplished officer, Lieutenant-General Schofield, and that equally accomplished officer, Major-General Miles; and we had before us the representatives of the staff department here in Washington. If I recollect aright, there was not a line officer whose views were submitted to the Committee on Military Affairs. So far as I know, the only officers who appeared there were staff officers—men that have no command, men who do not command, but men who act by virtue of the orders of their superiors.

Now, I am not complaining of that. I am not criticising that; but I am calling the attention of this House to the fact, and it is a fact, that so far as the hearings are concerned, and the information given to the committee, it comes to us solely from the staff department up here at headquarters, from men who did not command men; who under the law can not command men; men who under the law as it now exists are in the staff for a lifetime.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I want to call the attention of this House to the real meat in the cocoanut of a large company to a regiment, and I get it from that frank and candid old soldier, General Schofield. I read to you from page 21 of the hearings:

I would say, though, in connection with the strength of the Army, that it would seem to be wise to make the necessary increase by adding as few regiments as practicable—

You know the fewer regiments we have the more men we must have in the company—and getting the necessary strength by giving very large size if necessary to the companies, making the enlisted strength very large in proportion to the number of officers—

That is what this bill does—

so, if the time comes, as I hope it may in a very few years, when a considerable reduction can be made in the force now presumed to be necessary, that it can be done without any injury to the military effectiveness by simply discharging unnecessary enlisted men, still leaving an efficient organization of 50 or 80 or 100 men to the company.

I would not hesitate, with that in view, to make the companies as large as 150 men, and I know from my own experience that with such officers as are now found in the Regular Army a company of 150 men can be made more effective than any new troops under new officers could be made in a short time, although troops organized as our volunteers generally are, of the character generally found among them, would become as good as regulars in the course of a few years; but for a long time a company of volunteers would be less efficient than a company of 150 men organized under such officers as now exist in the Army.

Subordinating the efficiency of the organization of the Army to the interest of the commissioned officers when the time comes to reduce the Army——

Mr. COX. That is what it means.

Mr. MARSH. That is the meat in the cocoanut. That was the meat in the cocoanut of the Regular Army bill last spring, when it came in here providing for 250 enlisted men in an infantry company. I asked of General Schwan, who was one of the three or four staff officers who prepared this bill, about it. It turned out upon the hearing that three or four staff officers—if I misstate it, the chairman will correct me—it turned out in the hearings that three or four staff officers in the War Department, men who never will have command of troops, who now are barred by law from the command of troops, three, four, five, or six officers up here in the War Department prepared this bill—and if I am in error, the chairman can correct me—with some corrections and some suggestions that the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs himself made.

Mr. RAY of New York. Will the gentleman permit me?

Mr. MARSH. I will permit a question.

Mr. RAY of New York. I understand the gentleman to say that if the idea of General Schofield is carried out for the proper organization of full regiments, and a larger number of enlisted men in the companies or regiments is provided for, it will operate in the interest of the officers when we come to reduce the Regular Army, if that is ever done.

Now, it struck me—and if I am wrong I will be pleased to have the gentleman correct me—that that will not be so, because the fewer the number of regiments the fewer the number of officers; and therefore, when we come to reduce the Regular Army, by reducing the number of enlisted men there will not be as many commissioned officers remaining as there would be if we had more regiments with their necessary officers and the same number of enlisted men as in the Army with the larger number of regiments.

Mr. MARSH. I see the trouble in the gentleman's mind. Suppose the infantry organization contains 50,000 men; that is about what this bill provides for—145 men to a company. Suppose two or three years from now Congress passes a law reducing the number of men in the infantry to 20,000. Then 30,000 of the infantry are mustered out, leaving the companies, instead of 145 strong, 50 strong, and, as General Schofield said, thereby preserving the organization and not disturbing the officers.

Mr. COX. That is the point.

Mr. BROMWELL. Will the gentleman from Illinois permit a question?

Mr. MARSH. If the gentleman will wait a minute. On page 33 of the hearings before the committee, in response to a question that I propounded to General Schofield, he said:

Mr. MARSH. Now, in case, after the organization of this army of 145 men to the company, it was found that we could reduce it ten or fifteen or twenty thousand under your system, the men could be mustered out without any injustice in mustering out officers?

General SCHOFIELD. Yes. I think that would be a very important matter. It would save the danger of having to reduce the number of regiments, and so obviate the stagnation in promotion that would follow such a course. You want to make an organization that will last and that will be efficient, and let the President fill it up when necessary.

Now I will listen to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BROMWELL].

Mr. BROMWELL. The question I propose to ask is——

Mr. MARSH. How much time, Mr. Chairman, have I remaining?

Mr. BROMWELL. I will take but a minute.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has occupied thirty-four minutes.

Mr. BROMWELL. The question I propose to ask is as to the contract relation existing between the officers of the United States Army who become regulars and the Government. I understood the gentleman to say a few days ago that in his judgment an Army officer, regularly mustered into the regular service, had a claim for his salary, or at least a right to retirement with salary for the rest of his life.

Mr. MARSH. The gentleman from Ohio misunderstood me.

Mr. BROMWELL. Let me put my question.

Mr. MARSH. Well, you are going to base the question on a misunderstanding.

Mr. BROMWELL. Now, I ask the gentleman this question: If the number of men is enlisted at 100 instead of 150, as in this bill, that will make one-half more regiments than are provided for by this bill, and it would increase the number of Regular Army officers one-half. What I want the gentleman to state is, whether, in his judgment, the officers who would be retired when the regiments were mustered out, in case a reduction became necessary, would have any claim against the Government for their salaries after the muster out?

Mr. MARSH. Mr. Chairman, what I want is a properly organized army. I do not want the efficient reorganization to be subordinated to the interests of the officers or anybody else that may take place in future years. I do not think that Congress should so legislate as to make it necessary to muster out of the service three or four years hence, when a reduction of the Army takes place, men who have devoted their lives to the Army service; while they have no vested rights to remain in the service until the period of retirement, yet I would not have Congress deliberately legislate with a view to mustering them out, when it is not necessary to do so.

Mr. COX. I hope my friend from Illinois will yield for a moment.

Mr. MARSH. I will hear the gentleman.

Mr. COX. Of course you will. [Laughter.]

Mr. MARSH. I always have to. [Laughter.]

Mr. COX. Under the bill when you come to reduce the Regular Army and muster out the privates——

Mr. MARSH. Under this bill we do not reduce it.

Mr. COX. You muster out the privates and keep the officers. Is not that so?

Mr. MARSH. Now, Mr. Chairman, when we get to the consideration of this bill under the five-minute rule, I will submit an amendment reducing the infantry company to the present number of 106 enlisted men.

Now, there is one other point I desire to call the attention of the House to, and that is the reorganization of the staff of the Army, and I do it for the purpose of expressing my views on that subject, because the time, if it has not now come, will come when this reform I suggest in the staff of the American Army will be accomplished.

Your staff now is a permanent staff. The officers on that staff are selected from the line of the Army by the President and appointed to the lowest grade where a vacancy occurs in the staff. They remain on the staff for life, or until the age of retirement. They no longer acquire experience in the field; they no longer have experience in commanding men; but they remain upon the staff for the rest of their lives.

When we get to the point under the five-minute rule where amendments may be offered, I shall offer an amendment providing that hereafter all vacancies in the staff of the Army shall be filled by details from the line for a period not exceeding four years (if the officer should not earlier be returned to his regiment), and at the end of that time, under the provisions of this amendment, such officers will be sent back to the line of the Army whence they came and will not be eligible again for staff duty until they have served in the line as long as they have served in the staff.

Mr. HENDERSON. Suppose in the meantime the vacancies caused by detailing them to staff duties are filled?

Mr. MARSH. The vacancies will not be filled. There need be no trouble in arranging that matter. That is a question of detail which can not interfere with the practical operation of this proposition. Under this system we shall be training the staff in the duties of the line, and we shall be training the line in the duties of the staff. Suppose, Mr. Chairman, that thirty-three years ago, at the close of the civil war, such a provision as I have just outlined had been in the law. Then when this Spanish war broke out your regiments would have been filled with competent staff officers. And while I have no word of criticism, while I have none but words of praise for the staff officers who performed their duties in the recent Spanish war, I will say that if there was any weak point in our military forces during that war it was with the staff in the field. Witness the condition of things at Tampa, and I will not go further on that point.

The measure I am advocating will bring the staff and the line of the Army in closer touch, and will largely, if not entirely, prevent jealousy, envy, and ill feeling that exist in the Army between the line and the staff, and which always will exist while the staff is a separate organization.

I would not interfere with the gentlemen who are now in the staff; let them remain. But when vacancies hereafter occur or when new staff officers may be provided for by future legislation, the amendment would cover such cases.

Now, Mr. Chairman, one word further, and I am through. The bill provides for the abolition of the regimental form in the artillery. If you will refer to the hearings, you will find that General Schofield and General Miles both agreed that that feature of the bill was not right. Both of those distinguished officers—and they are the only officers who had command of anything that were heard before the committee—both of those officers were emphatic in adhering to the present regimental organization of the artillery.

So much, Mr. Chairman, for the provisions of this bill. Now, a word or two to show why, in my judgment, the President should be clothed with the power, to be exercised in his good discretion, to increase the Regular Army from 26,610 to not exceeding in the neighborhood of 100,000.

New conditions have come to the country. New responsibilities have fallen upon our shoulders. I was one of the gentlemen on this floor last spring who tired of diplomatic attempts to cure the troubles that existed in the neighboring island of Cuba. I was one of the gentlemen of this House who were anxious, on the very day that we received the news of the blowing up of the Maine, to declare war against Spain. I would have done it the next morning if I could have had my way. When the declaration did come, I was one of the gentlemen on this floor who urged it in season and out of season. And when I did that, Mr. Chairman, I stood ready then, as I stand ready now, to assume all the responsibilities that might flow from that war. And one of the responsibilities flowing from that war is the possessions that we now have in Porto Rico, and Cuba, and the Philippine Islands. Whether you are in favor of retaining the Philippine Islands for all time, or whether you are in favor of retaining them only so long as may be necessary to establish law, order, peace, and good government there on the part of the people, in either event the President needs an increase of the Army above 26,610.

I have heard the question asked very frequently on this floor, "What is the policy of the Administration with reference to the Philippine Islands?" I do not know what the policy of the Administration is now or what it will be in the future. I have no hesitation in saying here now, as I said to the people of my district in every one of those seven counties in Illinois, that, so far as I am concerned, I am in favor of holding the Philippine Islands and Porto Rico as long as the people of this country desire to hold them. There is no halfway measure with me on this matter. The Philippine Islands are ours by conquest; and I would not return them to Spain; I would not leave them to the mercies of their own people, who are incapable of self-government. I would give to those islands all the liberty that they are capable of enjoying and properly exercising.

I would hold those islands, not as a part of the United States, but as the property of the United States, and I would make such rules and regulations for their government as may be deemed wise by Congress from time to time. I would apply to those islands such tariff laws as Congress might deem necessary from time to time. I would apply such tariff laws to imports from those islands to this country as Congress may deem best. I would apply tariff laws in those islands to the products of other countries as well as our own, as Congress may deem necessary from time to time. In other words, I would not make those islands a part of the United States as we made Louisiana, but I would make them the property of these United States, so that the people of those islands may enjoy just such rights as the American Congress deems wise and best to confer upon them.

Why, Mr. Chairman, somebody says, "Would you use force to bring about this condition of things?" I would. Of course I would use force to bring about this condition of things. [Applause on the Republican side.] I would not have this Government a sneak and an imbecile.

Why are we sending troops and munitions of war to Manila and the Philippine Islands if it is not necessary to use them to preserve law and order and assert our authority in these islands? Nobody is responsible for the expression of these views, let me say, but myself.

Mr. COX. Nobody wants to be responsible for them.

Mr. MARSH. There is nothing new in this. Why, we used force of arms before in this country on numerous occasions. It has been necessary at times in our history. When we became the possessors of the Louisiana purchase in 1803, we sent troops there at once to take possession. We have not acquired a solid foot of territory in any portion of our land in all of that time that we had not sent a standing army there to maintain law and order and to protect the peace of the people. The acquisition of territory during the present century in every case has been followed by the same process, and we have kept this territory in that connection for years until it acquired statehood under our laws. The Regular Army has been there all of the time—a part of the standing Army to maintain law and order. Not volunteers, Mr. Chairman, please remember, but a standing Army in every instance.

When we acquired California from Mexico and acquired the Territory of New Mexico, we had no sooner done so than we sent a standing army, not volunteers, but men from the Regular Army of the country, to maintain law and order there and to protect our rights. And we did not ask the consent of the people there as to whether they were willing or not that our Army should be there. We sent troops into Florida after we had paid cash for it and closed a solid business transaction for the acquisition of that country—we sent an army there to maintain the dignity and the power of the United States and to enforce law and order and to preserve peace amongst the people. What objection, then, can there be to operating in the same way and exercising the same functions in other places? The people, speaking for all of these Territories, thank God to-day that the United States Government did send the Regular Army there from time to time as was found necessary. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Why, sir, the proposition to use force and compel obedience to the laws of the United States, the proposition to use the Army of the Government to reclaim and care for territory belonging to the Government of the United States, is, I repeat, no new one. It is a part of the history of the country.

I do not like to refer to the civil war, but I must do so, because it is one of the leading incidents, one of the leading illustrations, of the doctrine to which I am referring; that is, the doctrine of using force to preserve and maintain American territory. We used force for four long years in that struggle, and my friends on both sides of the House will well remember the fact. We mustered the largest army of modern days and fought a war for four long years, one of the greatest on record.

For what purpose? To compel a people to submit to the Constitution of the United States of America against their will. And they did submit. And, Mr. Chairman, there is not a man of them to-day but what glories in the fact that the old flag floats over them, although they fought for four years with courage and valor to down it. Even my friend from Tennessee, Colonel COX, is proud that he lives under the "starry banner;" and the old flag in all of its glory is enshrined in his heart on the 4th day of every July, when it waves over his own beautiful home in the State of Tennessee. The men who submitted to force have learned the beauties of American rule and of the protection afforded by the American flag. And they are the very last persons on earth who should resent the use of military force to retain territory belonging to this country. They are the last persons, I say, who should do so—gentlemen like my friend from Tennessee, whom I regard very highly.

But for the use of that force, but for the use of an army of one and a half or two millions of men, where would you and your people be to-day? Talk about this proposition of "using force" to compel obedience and enable the country to retain its territory! Why, it is preposterous, and ought not to come certainly from gentlemen on the other side of the House. They ought to know that if the result of force has spread such blessings and prosperity, contentment and love of country to the people of the South, great God, what may it not bring to the people of the Philippine Islands! [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. COX. Mr. Chairman, by the indulgence of the gentleman, your compliments to the South, let me state——

Mr. MARSH. With my friend's consent, I must decline just now to be interrupted.

Mr. COX. I only want to say a word.

Mr. MARSH. Well, if my friend wants to ask a question, I will gladly yield.

Mr. COX. Oh, well, you will have no trouble about my question. Let me say one word to you——

Mr. MARSH. Very well; say it. [Laughter.] Let me put one to you first, however, before you begin. Are you not glad the Southern Confederacy failed, and that the Union of the country has been restored, and was restored by force of arms? Now answer that frankly, from your heart. [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. COX. I will do it.

Mr. MARSH. I know you are a patriot and love your country and glory in that flag. Now, say so to these people. [Laughter and applause.] And say it so loud that the people down in Tennessee can hear it.

Mr. COX. Do not be excited about the flag. I have my convictions, as you have yours. You need not attack me.

Mr. MARSH. Oh, no.

Mr. COX. I did what I thought was my duty.

Mr. MARSH. That is right; I know you did. I am not denying that.

Mr. COX. I have no apology to make in this Congress or anywhere else.

Mr. MARSH. I would not have you to do it. I would be ashamed of you if you did.

Mr. COX. Well, if you did expect it, I would not respect you.

Mr. MARSH. No, no.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

Mr. COX. I wish I had one minute. [Laughter.]

Mr. HAY. I yield to the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. DINSMORE] thirty minutes.

Mr. DINSMORE. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MARSH] who has just taken his seat is a grizzled veteran of the Union Army in the civil war. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. COX], with whom he was in altercation, another, of the Confederacy. I would be glad if I could give expression to my emotions in hearing these two in fraternal terms discussing the welfare, the hopes of our common country, and referring to the past without bitterness or reproach. The gentleman from Illinois asked my friend from Tennessee if he was not glad the South had failed to disrupt the Union, and that the Stars and Stripes to-day float over a reunited, a consolidated country. As a son of the South, keenly sensitive to her honor, and resentful of any imputation against her motives or her cause in that unfortunate period, I say to the gentleman from Illinois that I am glad. I rejoice that we have a reunited country, with one flag and one people—a people devoted to the preservation of the inestimable blessings of free institutions for ourselves and all humanity.

Gentlemen have said with reference to the war with Spain that it is a blessing, in one sense at least, that it has united the sections of this country and made them all loyal and true to the Government. I deny this, Mr. Chairman. It has only furnished the opportunity for the people all over the land to discover that they are one people, loyal and united, forgetful of past differences, but this has been true for years. Lincoln and Grant conquered the feeling of rebellion largely in the South, and they did it more by what transpired at the surrender at Appomattox and afterwards than they did with their arms upon the hard-fought fields before. [Applause.] It was done in the terms of surrender and the treatment of the surrendered Confederates.

I was not prepared yesterday for the statement of the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. DOLLIVER], that the utterances upon this side of the Chamber had been almost treasonable. Mr. Chairman, has the time come when questions of great national importance are pending and we, as representatives of the people in the discharge of our duties to our constituencies, dare to speak out boldly, as all American citizens should speak, that we should be charged with treason; that we shall be considered as traitors? The gentleman said that the President had been twice insulted upon this floor.

I could not sit quietly and hear an insult offered to the President of the United States, but I have never heard it. Although he is the highest official in this land—and in the world, for that matter—he is but the servant of the people, an American citizen, and we have the right, nay, it is our duty, to animadvert upon his official conduct when it deserves criticism and censure.

I would approach the present crisis, Mr. Chairman, without any feeling of partisanship. It is one which requires the unbiased, the unprejudiced consideration of every member of this body. It is one fraught with more than usual importance to our people. Its results may lead to disaster. We who would caution against any imprudent action, against unwisdom, as we believe, are sometimes called pessimists. It suits the humor of our imperialistic friends to so characterize us, but, sir, I think we are but patriotic conservatives. I have no tolerance for that expression of opinion which I see sometimes about "little America." America is not little. She is great, and has grown great by the energies, intelligence, patriotism, and courage of our own people, attending to their own business, in their own dominion.

In the limited time allotted to me it is scarcely possible for me to do more than to make a protest in my own behalf and that of my constituency against the proposed measure to largely increase the standing Army and the Government's policy which has brought the measure before Congress. I can not conceive of any condition consistent with the safety, welfare, and happiness of the American people which would justify the increase of the Army proposed by this bill.

For many years the Army has been limited in its numbers by the law as it now exists, and though the population has outgrown the numerical strength of the Army in its proportion, nevertheless it has been at all times in the past sufficient to meet every requirement for military purposes. Our national history in the past century is without a precedent in the history of nations. Our growth in science and art, in civilization and learning, in invention and industrial development, has challenged the admiration of the world.

When the fathers established this American Republic by a Revolution in behalf of liberty and the equality of man, although successful in the initial steps, the world laughed and prophesied that the Government thus established would be but a brief experiment. The flight of time has changed contempt into admiration and wonder, and to-day we stand without a superior in the family of nations.

In civilization, in industrial enterprise, in scientific development, in educational advancement, in moral and intellectual growth, we stand in advance of many and behind none. We have achieved all this, sir, without a great standing army, walking in the well-defined and unquestioned paths of constitutional and peaceful pursuits, in the way pointed out to us by the patriot fathers who laid deep the foundations of the Republic. We were ever taught by those fathers that a great military establishment was a menace to individual freedom and might be made an instrument for the destruction of the liberties of the people.

The purpose of the establishment of this Government was the promotion of human rights, the enlargement of human liberties, the universal equality of man. It was designed that this should be a government where the people might live together upon terms of equality, at peace with each other and with all the world, where tyranny should not exist, and where the civil should predominate over the military authority, a government which should respect the rights of foreign nations and excite the just animosity of none. "Peace and honest friendship with all nations, entangling alliances with none," is the graphic expression by which Jefferson defined our relations with the world.

How successful we have been in following these salutary and happy principles is attested by the wondrous success which we have achieved. Until the recent changed conditions growing out of the war with Spain, has there ever been any to suggest the necessity to increase our military establishment, as is proposed by this measure? Have any before had the temerity to insist that there was a demand for a large increase of our Army? No, Mr. Chairman, it has been universally known that a land of peace and industry had no such requirements, and there were none to advocate it. Indeed, sir, the conditions twenty-five, thirty years ago were such as to require a greater military force than at any time since until hostilities began with Spain.

The Indian tribes, in the interior of the country, remote from the fringes of civilization on the Atlantic and the Pacific, were numerically stronger and more warlike and savage than at the present day, and more troops were required to keep them in subjection and restrain them from the perpetration of outrages against the whites in those sparsely settled localities. It has always been considered that the only purpose of a standing army was to police the country in the Territories, assist the Executive authority of the Government within constitutional limitations, and form a nucleus about which the militia of the country might be constructed into a military force requisite for the demands of any emergency.

A standing army has only been tolerated as a necessary evil, and it certainly should be kept within bounds commensurate with necessity. The people are entitled to administration of government with the least possible measure of expense, and the expenses of maintaining a standing army are enormous. Each soldier is a charge upon the labor and industrial production of the country; he adds nothing to the general stock of wealth, and his subsistence is taken from the earnings of toil in which he does not participate.

When he is disabled, he is pensioned for life; when he grows old and infirm, he is retired and maintained at the Government expense; no other class of citizens enjoys these benefits than the military forces on land and sea. The people have a right, therefore, to demand that these forces shall be kept within the strict limitations of necessity. It is proposed by this bill to quadruple the expense of the Army to the people. If it is done, Mr. Chairman, it shall be without my consent. I perceive no necessity to justify it. I recognize no conditions that require it.

The supremacy of the civil over military authority was what Jefferson advised, and the experience of the world proves that it is wise to maintain it. Let us take a lesson from France, our sister Republic, yet barely a republic—more a military despotism. The army, if not the supreme influence, has so superseded civil authority that it seems impossible to resist its power. France is a republic in name, and yet it is possible there for man to be deprived of his liberty without due presentment, without information, and without trial. We have seen Dreyfus banished and imprisoned in cruel and wretched solitude "incommunicado," denied the privilege of confronting the witnesses against him or even of knowing the evidence. Palpably the result of military tyranny, the supplanting of civil by the military authority. If the over-sanguine say such conditions are impossible here, I answer that no man can say. Great things result from small beginnings. A rivulet is a thing of beauty, to inspire a poet's fancy, but when it grows to be a river it is an irresistible flood.

It is proposed that this large increase shall be made in obedience to a demand growing out of our changed conditions. It is said that we must have a military force in Cuba, in Porto Rico, in Hawaii, and in the Philippines, and it is suggested that war is likely to occur to us and that our force is insufficient upon which to build an efficient army.

Mr. Chairman, I have no patience with or tolerance for the tendencies of the hour. I disapprove of the method adopted for securing to the Cubans a stable and permanent government, and I utterly abhor the proposed annexation of the Philippine Islands to the dominion of the United States. We are told, sir, by different eminent authorities in military circles that from thirty to fifty thousand men are necessary to maintain order in Cuba while a stable government is being established.

I am not an expert in military science—I pretend to be only a civilian; but I assert to this House that if the people of the country and the Congress of the United States had dreamed that such exorbitant demands would be made they would have been more reluctant to take up arms in a cause prompted solely by sympathy and humanitarian impulse.

What man dreamed of conquest when war was declared? The Congress, in the war resolutions, specifically and in distinct terms disavowed any purpose of conquest, and we believed that the good faith of this Government and the integrity of the American character was a sufficient guaranty against hypocrisy and deceit and a betrayal of our expressed purpose. The President of the United States, on April 11, 1898, in a message to Congress, used this unequivocal language with reference to Cuba:

> I speak not of forcible annexation, for that can not be thought of. That, by our code of morality, would be criminal aggression.

What did the President mean by this language? He could only mean that the United States would not forcibly annex Cuba to her territory without the consent of the Cubans themselves. What does the President propose to do with reference to the Philippines? Is not his language used with reference to Cuba equally pertinent to those islands? What is it that is holding up the country to-day, awaiting the action of ratification to a treaty which has been extorted from Spain with the bayonet at her throat?

Spain has yielded to us under these conditions her sovereignty over the Philippines. She did it not without long and persistent protest, but she was a conquered foe, subject to the dictation of her conqueror, and had to yield. But after this remission by Spain of her authority, her sovereignty, such as it was, we are confronted by the graver problem of the unwillingness of the Filipinos to submit themselves to our authority. What does the President propose to do? What does his administration advise him to do?

The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. DOLLIVER], and other gentlemen who stand for this Administration, decline to tell us; they only tell us that the President will do all things well, but the rack and thumbscrew applied by the relentless gentleman from Indiana [Mr. JOHNSON] could not extort from the gentleman from Iowa yesterday a statement as to what he wished the Government to do with reference to the Philippines. They are content to cast it into our teeth that if there is a failure of the ratification of the treaty it will be due to Democratic opposition; that a failure to ratify will leave us at war with Spain, while ratification would bring us much-desired peace.

Ratification of the treaty closes the incident with Spain, but opens another as serious with the inhabitants of the Philippines. We are told that by opposition to the treaty we would prevent peace and continue the war with Spain. How absurd! Will Spain take up arms again because we refuse to ratify the treaty for the reason that it extorts more from her than we are willing to take? Besides, if she would, she could not fight us again. Will she send back her soldiers that we have returned to her with guns in their hands? Where and how will they land? Where is her navy? Can Cervera and Montojo muster their ships from the bottom of the sea? Those ships are no longer engines of destruction, but habitations for fishes and slimy reptiles of the deep that play hide and seek behind piles of "dead men's bones." Spain is helpless against us. It can no longer be a question of war with her. It is a question of national honor and our own preservation, which we must determine for ourselves without consideration of Spain, and gentlemen must know it. Since the beginning of our national life we have boasted that all just government is derived from the consent of the governed.

Shall we, then, govern a people without their consent—nay, even against their solemn protest and violent opposition? It does not answer for gentlemen to say we will confer the benefits of our civilization upon them, which is far better than anything which they can accomplish for themselves. Who has constituted us a judge? Doubtless the Britons thought we would be much better off under their Governmnt, but our fathers thought differently and asserted and maintained their right to govern themselves independently of Great Britain and her supposed superior civilization. No, Mr. Chairman, we may not do this thing. If it is done, then burn the Declaration of Independence, tear up the Constitution, and retrace the steps by which we have marched to national greatness and renown. There is a moral obligation upon us, but it is to our own people, to preserve their ancient and present liberties, to guard against exposing them to war with other nations, to exclude from our citizenship objectionable material—this is our obligation, and at the peril of this we owe no obligation to anybody.

At this point, Mr. Chairman, I hope I may be pardoned if I make a partisan digression. I have felt that this discussion should be conducted with no partisan feeling, but yesterday my distinguished friend from Iowa [Mr. DOLLIVER], so versatile in genius, so blessed with nature's gifts, having talents rarely given to men in this world, could not refrain in his remarks from partisan thrusts and taunts at this side of the House, entirely irrelevant to the matter under discussion.

When the distinguished gentleman from Iowa [Mr. DOLLIVER], who has no superior in this House nor elsewhere in many respects, being blessed with gifts of expression and thought, is driven from the dignified field of dispassionate discussion, from logical and legitimate debate, and tumbles and vaults in rhetorical athletics, seeking to win from the House its sweet applause and from his admirers and friends on the floor and in the galleries vocal approval, not by argument, but by prancing, prismatic platitudes [laughter], it shows to the country and to the House how absolutely barren is the ground upon which he stands of reason, logic, and argument.

Ah, he is not a man to leave the field of argument when there is material to be used. Not he, Mr. Chairman, nor the very able gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR], who the other day asked of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. CARMACK], "What would you have our Navy do in the Philippines?" The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. CARMACK] said, "Sail away and never look back." Thereupon the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR] said, "And have yourselves branded in the back as cowards."

Mr. GROSVENOR. The gentleman mistakes my answer. I said "And all the world would brand you as cowards."

Mr. DINSMORE. Well, as you like. "All the world would brand us as cowards." For what, Mr. Chairman? Why cowards? Because we abandon a country a part of which has fallen into the hands of our military forces in war? Why cowards, if they act in pursuance of and in conformity with the traditions and written creed of this country, within the spirit of the Constitution, not forgetting that this is a free government which respects the rights of every people in the world and whose own people govern themselves with a view of promoting their own happiness?

Who shall brand us as cowards? Who are cowards? They are people who do not dare to meet danger and who do not dare to do the right.

But my friend from Iowa [Mr. DOLLIVER], after speaking about the beautiful event of the unanimous vote upon the $50,000,000 appropriation, which he was pleased to consider the most glorious in the history of this country, as a vote of confidence in the President of the United States, said it was a misfortune—I speak from memory, because his speech is not in the RECORD this morning—it was a misfortune that a different feeling should have taken place on this side of the House, and that we should so suddenly become partisans as to have voted against the war-revenue measure. He criticises the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BAILEY] for certain utterances said to have been made somewhere. He said we voted against the revenue bill in the House of Representatives.

Did the gentleman tell the country why? Did he say that we did it because we were not willing to hold up the hands of the Administration? That is the implication. Does he not know—at least, if he had taken the pains and had sufficient interest to be accurate, he could have ascertained—that it was stated by the gentleman from Texas on this floor that if they would take out the bond feature of that measure, the Administration could get a unanimous vote for the war-revenue bill?

Mr. GAINES. And the speech of the gentleman from Texas was printed in the RECORD.

Mr. DINSMORE. Yes, the speech was printed in the RECORD. We withheld our support from that measure because the gentleman and his colleagues forced upon us and our constituents a bonded indebtedness which we felt was an injustice. Interest-bearing bonds when there was money in the Treasury! Interest-bearing bonds when we had other means by which revenue might have been obtained! Instead of complaining that it raised too much revenue, we suggested a way by which more revenue might be raised—by an income tax—which was rejected with scorn by gentlemen on the other side of the House.

The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. DOLLIVER] made allusions to our fondness over here for "moonshine" money. When, Mr. Chairman, did the gentleman from Iowa ascertain that the money advocated by the Democrats in the last campaign and upon the floor of this House is "moonshine?" He is a recent convert, Mr. Chairman. The gentleman from Iowa was not wont originally to hold to these views about "moonshine" money.

The gentleman has a record upon this floor and in the country upon the question of "moonshine" money; and if the House will give me its attention for but a moment (as I see the gentleman in his seat), I shall take pleasure in referring to a part of the record which he has made for himself. What I am about to read was said by him in 1890 in this House; and I will ask the Clerk to read from the RECORD that part which I have marked in pencil—an extract from a speech made by the gentleman from Iowa on the floor of this House upon the subject of "moonshine" money.

The Clerk read as follows:

The act of July 12, providing for the free coinage of the whole product of the American silver mines, is a monument to the wisdom of this Congress. It expands the currency by the annual addition of not less than $60,000,000 and keeps the money of the people as good as gold. The immediate effect of this law has been to advance the price of silver, and with the advance of silver every product of agriculture has felt the influence of advancing prices. It has solved the silver question and made the way to the free coinage of the world's silver supply easy and plain.

All this has been done without panic or financial convulsion, and in the light of what we have seen and done the words of Mr. Cleveland's last message to Congress read like the lines of a comedy. He said: "The Secretary recommends the suspension of the further coinage of silver, and in such recommendation I earnestly concur." The comedy lies in the queer fact that the very fellows who are most eager to make Mr. Cleveland President again are to-day the loudest in their pretended friendship for silver.

Mr. DINSMORE. Speaking of the farmers, he says:

They are not radicals or fanatics. They are the true, conservative force in American society.

The real anarchist of our day is not the miserable wretch in a garret working out his infernal ideas with gas pipe and dynamite. We need not fear such a man. The true anarchist in modern times is the bloodless spirit of wealth acquired without conscience, a spirit that in all ages has considered property as a mere possession and treated the commonwealth as a cheap and helpless word.

Mr. Chairman, the great misfortune to the country was that the gentleman's prediction did not prove true; and I presume the reason his prediction did not prove true was largely because he withdrew his support and influence from the purpose which was declared in that speech.

Mr. DOLLIVER. My friend will permit me to say that if he will read the whole speech, he will see that it was delivered against the free coinage of silver and not in favor of it, but in favor of the silver-purchasing law of 1890.

Mr. DINSMORE. I can not read the gentleman's whole speech, however delectable it might be; but I wish to say that it is inconceivable to me how words such as those just read could be made in opposition to silver.

Mr. CARMACK. He changed his position before he got through his speech.

Mr. DINSMORE. No; he did not. The passage read is from the concluding portion.

Mr. DOLLIVER. I voted against the free coinage of silver on the occasion when that speech was made, as I have done in every Congress since I have had the honor of a seat on this floor.

Mr. DINSMORE. Well, the gentleman's position on this question reminds me of an old fellow I once heard of who ran for the legislature. While serving there he voted for a law which proved to be unpopular. He went back home and ran as a candidate for reelection, and the people got after him for having voted for this obnoxious law. In defending himself he said: "Fellow-citizens, it is true I was for that law, but I was agin its enforcement." [Laughter.]

The gentleman says that he voted against free silver. I have not looked at the RECORD to see how he did vote, but I accept his statement in this case, as I always do his statements under every circumstance, as true. But if he was voting against free silver, he was telling the people that while Grover Cleveland, the enemy of the people, had been trying to crush silver, had quoted the recommendation of his Secretary of the Treasury in favor of suspending the further coinage of silver, and had said "in which declaration I earnestly concur." Then, says the gentleman from Iowa, the comedy lies in the fact that the very fellows who are most eager to make Mr. Cleveland President again are the loudest in their pretended friendship for silver. Here is a gentleman who voted against free silver using this language:

On the other hand, listen to the words of President Harrison's first message: "I have always been an advocate of the use of silver in our currency. We are large producers of that metal and should not discredit it." I predict that before the Administration of President Harrison ends silver will be coined by the United States without limit, as gold is now coined.

Is this a consummation to be wished? The gentleman is using this argument in favor of the Administration, whose servant he was, or one of whose members he was at that time. But, Mr. Chairman, he sings pæans of praise of the silver-bullion-purchasing law as having put up the price of silver bullion in the country and at the same time put up the price of every agricultural product. The gentleman was not trying to show the discrepancy and divergence between wheat and silver at that time.

Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Iowa on that occasion had most respectable company. Now when I speak of the President of the United States I want it understood that I speak of him respectfully—not only so, but I have high admiration for many of the qualities which he possesses. He is a genial, amiable gentleman; but my friend from Iowa was standing alongside of the President at that time. My friend from Iowa was expressing views which accorded with views expressed by the President in that same period.

My friend from Iowa was standing by the gentleman who has been elected and inaugurated President of the United States as the leader of the enemies of silver, and those enemies, as the gentleman said at that time, were Grover Cleveland and his followers. How things change, Mr. Chairman! Now, my friend still stands by the President; that is to say, to use the expression of the sailor, he is "standing by," waiting for the President to tell him what he must do. He seems to have no well-settled convictions as to what is the duty of the Government with reference to the Philippines.

The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. JOHNSON] yesterday mercilessly plied his questions to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. DOLLIVER] to obtain a direct response as to what ought to be done. The gentleman said he could answer; but he did not answer. I presume that having been placed once in the position of following the President on the money question, and having been obliged to take back his avowals and make explanations to the people, he does not want to commit himself this time until he finds out who else are with the President and what the President really means. [Applause.]

Ah, Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Iowa has not many defects; there are not many weaknesses in his character. He is brilliant and able. The only thing that I would suggest that any power can add to improve him would be that he might have the courage to stand by his own convictions—to announce them and follow no leader contrary to conscience. [Applause.]

Now, Mr. Chairman, I have consumed more time than I had intended to devote to what seems to be, and is partially, at least, an irrelevant matter. This bill to increase the Army is inseparably connected with the question as to whether we shall take, as a part of our dominions, the Philippine Islands. And the measure is urged with a great deal of energy for that purpose, and the possibility of our control of the Philippines is used as an argument in support of the bill. That is the main ground upon which the bill is urged before the House.

Why should we take the Philippine Islands? We should not take them, because, Mr. Chairman, in the first place, we have no earthly use for them.

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. Not for a naval station?

Mr. DINSMORE. Why, Mr. Chairman, in response to the suggestion of the gentleman from Michigan, when we were confronted with the question as to whether Hawaii should be annexed as a part of the United States, we were told by many gentlemen, and by my distinguished friend from Michigan particularly, that we needed these islands as a base for naval purposes or a naval station; and that it was the "key" to the Pacific Ocean, and would enable us to control the commerce of that great region, and we have Hawaii.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. HAY. I will yield to the gentleman from Arkansas ten minutes more.

Mr. DINSMORE. Mr. Chairman, I was proceeding to say that the islands of Hawaii were regarded as the key to the Pacific Ocean. Some of the members on this side of the House pointed out the fact that it was intended to use their occupation as an entering wedge to the possession of foreign territory and start upon this system of expansion, which would involve us with the great powers of the world which are contending for territory in the far East.

Now, the Philippine Islands, after Hawaii has been disposed of, have become important, and have become another key; and Guam, I presume, will be another "key" for commercial purposes; and the Caroline Islands will become a "key" for telegraphic communications; so that eventually, with all of these various "keys," Columbia will have to untravel all of its policy in the past and adopt the new arrangement, which will be contrary to the traditions, the history, and the interests of our people. [Applause.]

But the question of trade has been urged in behalf of these acquisitions, and the commercial interests of the country are presented as at least an apology for the acquisition of new territory. We have been told by gentlemen of the Republican party on this floor that the export trade of the United States—the foreign trade—has increased in an enormous proportion to the trade of other countries. This was asserted the other day by the distinguished gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BINGHAM], and afterwards, I think, by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR], and that we had become second only to one great power in the world in the matter of foreign trade, and that was Great Britain.

In the last Congress the President of the United States sent with his message to Congress a report communicated to him by his Secretary of State, setting forth the facts in relation to the foreign trade of the United States and showing results. I speak of the Annual Trade Review. This report tells us that the time has come when it can be no longer questioned that the United States can compete successfully in all the markets of the world against all of the powers of the world, and not only that, but even in their own peculiar markets.

How has all this been accomplished? At the point of flashing steel and bright bayonets? Under the frowning cannon of strategic keys and military outposts? Not at all. But our trade has thus grown while we were walking in the ways of peace, in accordance with the teachings of the fathers, according to the long-recognized principles of our Government, according to the spirit of the Constitution, which has given life and strength and success to the Republic; and yet we are told by gentlemen who support the pending bill that we must "have an army" to promote and protect that commerce!

Mr. Chairman, trade travels under the white banner of peace. It has always come in that way to America, and we can make ourselves first in the market of the world by keeping on terms of friendship and good will with other countries and offering terms mutually and reciprocally beneficial. That is what brings commerce to us; not standing armies, not fortresses in the sea, nor guns, nor swords, nor the paraphernalia of war. [Applause.]

What does the President of the United States propose to do with the Philippines? Do you know? Yesterday morning's press brings us a statement that General Otis is already having trouble in the Philippines, even at Manila. Not only at Iloilo, but a disturbance is likely to break out amongst the natives at any time at Manila, and the papers say that a victory over them would not be desirable at this time.

The President's purposes are carefully concealed with reference to our actions as a Government in that quarter. Now, what is the real purpose? Is it to turn the islands over to the people of the islands themselves to form their own government? If not, it is certain, at least, that nothing we can do will be acceptable to the people. What the people of the islands want is independence; they will be satisfied with nothing else. They will resist all else with arms. Mr. Chairman, the situation presented is unique. The President has said repeatedly that he did not desire possession of the Philippines, but asks the stereotyped question: "What can we do?" It is insisted that if we relinquish all claim and control that the several thousands of Spanish prisoners in their hands will be butchered. Yet the natives assure us that if we will withdraw our claims and leave them to control their own destiny these prisoners shall be all released.

We are told that if we leave them to themselves the Filipinos will murder each other, will cut each other's throats. Mr. Chairman, I would regret to see that, but I would far rather see it than to have our people cut their throats. [Applause on the Democratic side.] I would much prefer to see that, Mr. Chairman, to seeing them cut our people's throats. It is war, and war to which no man may place a limit now, if we attempt the conquest of these people. Why talk about relinquishing possession when we have never had possession and can not obtain it without bloody, deadly war?

We never have had anything but Manila. Dewey had to have a place of shelter for his ships, being shut out by the laws of neutrality from other ports. He sought it from the enemy, and captured it like a true American, and wrote his name in golden letters upon the scroll of history; but he took it for military purposes, and destroyed the enemy's fleet there, and when he did it his purpose was accomplished so far as the fleet was concerned. Mr. Day, the late Secretary of State, and later commissioner, some time ago, according to the press, made the suggestion that when Dewey failed to sail away on the morning after the battle of Manila he imposed upon us the responsibility of taking the Philippines. How? Why? We had Manila. Of those 2,000 islands we had one port, with the fortress at Cavite. We could have retained a naval station, if you please, and it was desirable; but I can conceive of no obligation entailed upon us in behalf of the natives that demands of us to imperil our own interests for them.

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. Would you advise doing that?

Mr. DINSMORE. Doing what?

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. Retaining the island of Luzon as a naval station?

Mr. DINSMORE. I advise nothing in that regard; but I tell my friend that I do not think we need it. I do not think it is necessary. You have provided one naval station already by the treaty. You get one in Guam, you have Hawaii, and Pearl Harbor will be made a naval station, and I do not believe it is necessary for our purposes of commerce or of defense. You want it as a strategic point, and you have got nothing to defend by it except the strategic point itself.

But, Mr. Chairman, the gentleman diverted me from the course of my thought. It is argued we must take them for their own preservation. Have gentlemen reflected upon what this involves? They do not reflect that before we have them in subjection we must keep our boys there, thousands of them, as they are going over there now, dying with pestilential and loathsome diseases, subject to be killed by the murderous inhabitants of those islands, many of whom are barbarians and cannibals. Their bleaching bones will whiten the plains of a thousand islands, the bones of our own boys, the sons of this happy land.

Do you want this? If this is your ambition, you will have it gratified. I would save my country from it, particularly when it brings us no single benefit, in my judgment. Those bones will be scattered wide, and you imperialists may gather them up and build of them a pyramid as a monument to your abandonment of Americanism, the safe ways of the Constitution, the sacred teachings of the Declaration of Independence; and I would have you inscribe upon it in grim letters of grinning skulls the language of the President, "Forcible annexation is criminal aggression." [Prolonged applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. HULL. I yield one hour to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR].

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Chairman, I trust I may be able to discuss the momentous questions that are pending before this body with due reference to the solemnity of the occasion, the importance of the issues presented, and the far-reaching consequence that may follow our action.

I shall not approach this subject indifferent to the opinions of others. I shall not approach this question with vituperation or denunciation. I shall not attempt the flights of eloquence and oratory that entertained the House yesterday upon either side of this question, for reasons perfectly manifest to the whole body of the House. I could not if I would, and I would not if I could. There are matters here of so much importance that I deem it proper not to reply to all the arguments or many of the arguments that have been presented, but to point out as well as I may be able the position which I occupy in my capacity as a Representative upon this floor, bound by no action of any party and controlled by no impetus other than my own judgment.

I do not wonder that among the representatives of the American people there should be a wide, distinct, and antipodean divergence of opinion upon what is said to be the question involved here. In order that any man may justify himself in discussing the past, the present, or the future supposed policy of the Government it has seemed to be admitted that by inference we will assume certain facts to be decided upon, certain administrative purposes developed, and certain policies already marked out, against which we inveigh. I shall try to come back, as well as I am able to do so, to the questions that are actually now pending in this proposed legislation.

I do not wonder that gentlemen on that side, under the inspiration of the opposition, say that this pending legislation is an assault upon the liberties of the American people. We have lived under this form of government for more than a hundred years. During all that time, or nearly all that time, we have had a standing army, as it is called. We have had officers in the Army rise to enormous popularity and distinction, appear upon the stage of politics, retire, die, and leave nothing but a fragrant memory to the people of the country.

I challenge the side of this House that undertakes to arraign this side of the Chamber for a purpose which they themselves created, a man of straw which they themselves construct, that there is no purpose of the kind that they assume, and that in the history of this country there has never been any military officer or any civil officer who by his orders to the Army or militia has ever trenched upon the rights, the privileges, and the immunities of the American people.

Men returned from the Army in the war with Mexico and became Presidential candidates and Presidents. They were citizens of the United States; they sought nothing but the applause of their fellow-citizens in the civil walks of life. They came from the battlefields of the civil war, men of enormous genius in war and wonderful popularity in peace; and yet no one of them ever failed, either in the Presidential office or in the halls of legislation or among the citizenship of the country, to draw the line closely and accurately between the domain of the military and civil authorities of the United States.

Only twice in the history of this country, so far as I now remember, has the Regular Army been used for any purpose other than opposition to the internal or external armed enemies of the Government. One of them was in the famous times when we sat here in midsummer horrified by the situation in a far distant State, in one of the great cities of the Union, when for the first time the law officer of the Government—a Democrat, a Democrat of Democrats, a Democrat whose record as a Democrat was as unassailable as any in the Government—gave to the President of the United States a written opinion, that no lawyer has ever assailed, that it was his duty to send troops to Chicago.

He did send them; and if I was appealed to to select a single act of that Administration that commended it above all other acts, I would point it out as being his stern, inflexible desire to stand against any exercise of the military against the rights, privileges, and immunities of the citizenship of the country. So I appeal to the records and say they sustain me in saying that there is nobody in this country, great or small, who ever harbored the thought that there might be a time come when a popular expression of sentiment in the United States—as it was put by one gentleman on the other side, would be seen the calling out of the Regular Army of the country to suppress and crush that sentiment.

It is a mere man of straw. Nobody believes it. There is no gentleman on this floor that believes that any administration of this Government, or any fractional part of this Government, from the President down to the humblest sheriff of a county, has it in mind, nor is it in the range of human possibility that, without the direst necessity, troops will ever be called to suppress even an insurrection anywhere. It is a slander against the American people. I do not complain of anybody who, in the heat of debate, wants to ornament his speech, and who will bring forward something of a death's head and crossbones as something of a fright to the people of this country, but I deny that the American character is rightfully assailed by any such attack as that.

Now, Mr. Chairman, therefore, this much I have entered upon for the purpose of defense against this allegation. Who on this floor is more jealous than any other of the rights of the common people of this country? Do gentlemen on the other side assume to themselves all the virtue, all the guardianship of the common people? This side of the Chamber belongs to a party that started out with Abraham Lincoln, with the rail splitter of Illinois, and from that time to this has never elected a man President who did not come from the so-called common people of the country. We have never elected a single candidate of the distinguished aristocracy or plutocracy of the State of New York for President yet, and certainly have never repeated a nomination three or four times in succession, to our sorrow. [Laughter.]

Mr. Chairman, the question here is, Is there a necessity for legislation upon the subject of the reorganization of the Army? I shall refrain in my remarks from discussing the merits of this bill—I mean the details; I mean those provisions of it which will be open to discussion and amendment when we come to read the bill for amendment. There may be a difference of opinion here—doubtless there is; and I shall condemn nobody because he differs with me. I reserve to myself the right, as each current question arises, to dispose of it, so far as my vote and action are concerned, as I see fit, always keeping in mind that I shall support the great purpose of this bill in so far as I understand it.

Now, on yesterday I listened with some considerable interest to the fiercest, most powerful, and in form of expression the most vindictive of all the attacks that have ever been made on this floor upon the present Administration of the Government. I have no criticism of the gentleman's purpose or motive; he has a genius for the field into which he entered; he has capacity away beyond the action governed, in my judgment, by wise consideration. But I shall treat his argument, so far as I refer to it, as an argument made in perfect good faith, without any improper or ulterior purpose or motive.

I am not here to assail the gentleman, but I will try to point out that upon the very foundation of his speech and upon the foundation upon which he builded the whole of that magnificent superstructure he laid down a false premise, an untrue declaration of conditions, and that, possibly without full knowledge of what he was saying, he made an argument which answered itself the very moment the intelligent mind recapitulates the history of the past few months. I will not refer to that now, but I want to go over briefly what has happened.

It is very easy, in a matter of this character, to stand to-day and say there were some things done last April that ought not to have been done at all, and it is just as easy, and a little easier, to say that there were some things done last April that ought to have been done differently from what they were done. I stood on this floor and received the arrows of criticism from both sides of the Chamber, and they were reiterated in the press of the country from many directions, that I was holding back—that is, that I was joined with those that were holding back the war.

Well, gentlemen, looking at the whole situation to-day, looking over the past history of my country since these eventful days of April, coming down to the present time, looking forward as well as I can, I am not only proud that I stood in the ranks of the men who are willing to go slow, but I almost wish the purposes of this Administration in averting war had been accomplished. But I dare scarcely say it—I dare scarcely say, looking as I now look upon the whole prospect ahead of us—I can hardly say that I would like to have been even the humble instrument to seek effectually to turn aside the providence of Almighty God in the matter of our nation's action.

But it is unwise and impolitic, and without any force, to discuss the question whether we ought to have gone to war or not. We did go to war. We went to war with a purpose which I am going to undertake to show we have never deviated from. I know it is easy to stand up and say we went to war for humanity, we went to war to relieve the downtrodden, and suddenly became imperialists and aggressors. The facts do not justify the assertion. I tried to point out that in the declaration of war adopted in this House there is an absurd provision for which nobody would vote to-day if he had an opportunity. The Government, under the guiding hand of this Administration, has never deviated from the declared purpose of the Government at the time, and stands to-day executing, simply as he is bound to do, the orders and decrees of this Congress, and the orders and decrees of civilization, and the orders and decrees of Almighty God.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Will the gentleman allow me a question?

Mr. GROSVENOR. I have not the slightest objection. I have no manuscript.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I did not understand what part of the declaration of war the gentleman said no man would support to-day. Will he be a little more specific?

Mr. GROSVENOR. I will.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Was it the Teller provision?

Mr. GROSVENOR. The declaration that the people of Cuba were, and of right ought to be, free. I never voted to strike that out, although I made a little struggle on the other item. Speaking for myself, and I do not believe the gentleman from Tennessee differs with me on that point, I never could see how it was, if the people of Cuba were free and independent, we ought to go to war or have any fuss about it. But that was a tub to the whale of the Cuban republic.

Mr. GAINES and Mr. COX rose.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Now, I will take but one of you at a time. I started in on the great leader of the Tennessee delegation. I will take any one of the others, but not two at a time.

Mr. GAINES. Define your position.

Mr. GROSVENOR. If I fail to define it, that will be my misfortune, not my fault. What does my friend Mr. Cox desire? Whenever a gentleman with white hair gets up I always respect them.

Mr. COX. Oh, well, your hair is as white as mine. [Laughter.] White hair does not mean much. Now, I want to ask——

Mr. GROSVENOR. The trouble with the gentleman is that he does not appreciate a good thing when he hears it.

Mr. COX. The trouble with the gentleman from Ohio is that he does not appreciate anybody but himself. [Laughter.]

Mr. GROSVENOR. I started out with the best effort I was capable of to show my appreciation of my friend from Tennessee, and I have been so unfortunate as first to fail to make myself understood, and, second, to irritate him.

Mr. COX. Oh, there is no trouble about that. The gentleman is doing the best he can.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Yes; and he is not responsible for his failure to penetrate some places in this House. [Laughter.]

Mr. COX. No; I am not responsible——

Mr. GROSVENOR. Now, I am through with that. I decline to yield further for a colloquy of this kind. If the gentleman has anything to say to me about this subject, I will be glad to hear it.

Mr. COX. Well, if we have got down to a point where we can talk business, that is all right. [Laughter.]

Now, I want to call the gentleman's attention to this proposition; let us see what he has to say about it: What right have we to dictate to the people of the island of Cuba what kind of a government they shall have?

Mr. GROSVENOR. Well, that is straw which has been fairly well thrashed by pretty able gentlemen.

Mr. COX. Oh, yes; the straw is pretty well thrashed, but you did the striking. Now go on.

Mr. GROSVENOR. If the gentleman will let me make my own speech in my own way, without repeating these old, time-honored interrogatories, I will try to get along to his satisfaction, if my time holds out.

Mr. COX. Yes; but your time will not hold out. [Laughter.]

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Chairman, I differ with the gentleman from Tennessee about his right to make me make one part of my speech at a time, to be directed by him. I propose to do the best I can in the hour allotted me, and I hope the gentleman will not use any more of it.

Mr. COX. I will not, because you can not get along anyway.

Mr. GROSVENOR. The gentleman has a lot of time which he says he reserved, and I have no doubt he will have a chance to be heard after a while.

Mr. Chairman, I was trying to proceed to say that the war came; and now the very first act of the war that was war is the act which has brought us into collision with our friends on the other side; and the whole of the trouble originated on the 1st day of May, 1898. It has not been very long since there seemed to be throughout this country an organized effort to make one of the great heroes of this war a candidate for the Presidency in 1900. And looking at the matter from my standpoint, that shows great wisdom on the part of the Democratic party. Their necessities have come home to them, and they are looking about with intelligence and devotion to their country's interest and their party's good, and a great body of them, headed by one of the great leading journals of the South, nominated George Dewey to be the Democratic candidate for President.

But it was Dewey that got us into the whole of this trouble. I do not charge the other side of the House with the responsibility for Dewey's attack on Manila; because I am free to admit that at that time I barely knew, with a limited knowledge, where Manila was. But in this country we learn a great deal. My friend from Indiana now understands all about the people of Manila and the Philippine Islands, and he has come to be exceedingly fond of a gentleman over there by the name of Aguinaldo, or something to that effect; and he has baptized him on the floor of this House as a second George Washington.

At the time of Dewey's attack on the Spanish fleet in the harbor of Manila not one of us knew within a thousand, I venture to assert, how many islands were embraced within the archipelago, and not one of us would dare to have put his money or have entered into an obligation of any kind to venture an assertion that would have come within a very long distance of the facts. We did not know anything of the question, as a rule. It was not familiar talk with us, and the people of the country knew nothing of it. But the Navy of the United States knew what was required of it. The Navy Department had a duty to perform, and that duty was performed faithfully and well. The Navy Department informed the commander of our fleet in these eastern waters that the fleet of the enemy had gone into a certain bay; that this fleet belonged to an enemy of our country, with which we were at war, and there is but one single, short, curt statement embodying the order of the Navy Department: "Go and find the enemy's fleet—the fleet of the Spaniards—and capture or destroy it."

And the most brilliant page, Mr. Chairman, in the naval history of the United States, brilliant as the shining of the stars, glorious almost as the flag of the Union itself, was the answer of that splendid officer and of his men to that order. [Applause.] And when he had executed the order what could he do? He was powerless to get out of Manila Bay. His ships were so far disabled—they were so short of coal and naval supplies—that he was compelled to stay there. Is there anybody on the other side of the House who would undo what was done by that gallant officer? Is there anybody who would tear from the history of the American people that page of our history containing the operations of our naval forces in the harbor of Manila? Is there one, I ask, who would do so? Now, in this same connection, will my friend from Tennessee tell me—and not in my time, because I have but little time, but in his own time, for he is abundantly able to answer in that time, and I respectfully ask the question—will he tell me, will he tell this House, under what law, under what provision of international law, and under what provision or sentiment of public duty there could ever come a time while Spain resisted our authority when we could turn over to the Spanish Government the position and the territory we occupy in that oriental sea?

Now, then, Mr. Chairman, let us proceed a little further. The war went on. I will not discuss its glorious features. It is not necessary to do so. The history of the country will elaborate and enshrine them in its pages. I stand here to protest, in the name of the glory of my country, against the assaults which have been made upon our honor and our integrity. [Applause on the Republican side.] I will not discuss the question of the greatness or the comparative value of regulars or volunteer troops. It is not necessary that I should do so. Somebody said the volunteers did most of the fighting in other wars. That is true, as a matter of fact. But nobody who knows anything of the results of the wars in which this country has been engaged will undertake to assert here, on the floor of this House, that the proposition now pending is not one that is fraught with good and supreme importance to the people of the country. There is nobody who knows anything of war who will imperil his credibility by asserting that we could make fighting men of the volunteers of the country in four months' time and in the manner that has been suggested by the opponents of the pending bill.

It is true, Mr. Chairman, and we glory in the truth, that volunteers achieved military renown at Santiago. They carried the banner of the country with a valor that the history of the world does not excel in these bloody battles on the island of Cuba, and the wonder is not that so many mistakes were made, but the wonder is that the volunteers got there and so distinguished themselves in that noble charge and in the battles around Santiago, and cooperated so well with the forces of the Regular Army of the United States and helped to carry the flag of the country to imperishable and undying victory. [Applause.] And I will not undertake to quarrel about the men who won that victory, whether volunteers or regulars. I will not enter into or be a commissioner to partition out the glory of Santiago between the men who were on the ground and who took part in that celebrated contest. I will not enter into a contest to partition the glory to any man or any set of men in the Army or in the Navy. It is enough to say that they did their full duty without question until disgraceful bickerings and recriminations began at home.

Mr. Chairman, I hope to live to see the day when the American people will find the man or set of men, from the highest to the lowest, who, either by inspiration or otherwise, have tarnished the name of the United States and its Army, punished, whoever they may be, whether high or low, with the whip of scorpions and the contempt of a free and honorable people. [Applause.] Let them be punished with the reprobation of a free people. [Applause.] We shall expect and hope that in these cases there will be full proof, not of any mistake—for I know something of mistakes; they may be made by everybody—not of inadvertence or anything of that kind, but there must be something shown of personal dereliction of duty which will be manifest to the American people; and then, Mr. Chairman, the time for punishment has come! And until the time has come we must uphold the flag of our country's honor. [Applause.]

Then came the close of the war. Oh, was it not a glorious day for the armies of the United States! It so happened that I came to the shores of my country, a passenger, coming up the magnificent bay of New York, that so charms even the citizens of the Old World as they approach that magnificent harbor. In the morning a paper appeared on the vessel, and I learned for the first time that a protocol of peace had been signed. There was nowhere on the continent on that day a John Hook to make outcry and complaint against it; nobody calling "Beef!" "Beef!" And I will stand here, and stop to say it, that I challenge any man on this side of the House or that side of the House to assert that the President of the United States, from the day the proclamation of war was signed to the date of the signing of the protocol of peace, failed in any duty in his high office that he was called upon to discharge. [Applause on the Republican side.]

For one hundred and twenty days and nights he kept up the almost sleepless vigil, and there stood behind him and by the side of him during all that time a man of whom I turn aside for a moment to speak, the head of the Department of the Adjutant-General, a soldier who volunteered at 17 years of age, and served from that day to this in all the gradations from a private soldier up through the lieutenancies to be a brigadier-general and head of the great Adjutant-General's Department. No man on this continent ever did his duty better than did Henry C. Corbin. [Applause on the Republican side.] He was sleepless, untiring, just, intelligent, wise, and patriotic.

The President of the United States found himself with a protocol of peace submitted to him that nobody protested against, and he signed it, and he sent a commission. I am not here to utter fulsome praise, but that from the day when Franklin and Jay stood before the British commissioners to make the great peace that acknowledged our independence down to this day there never was an equal number of men who more fully and more grandly represented the best type of the best patriotism of the American people than did the Peace Commission at Paris. What did they meet there? They met the eyes of the world. They had no sentiment of politics. They had no thought of future political aggrandizement. One of them, I doubt not, fully understood when he took upon himself the high duty that he so grandly discharged that he was taking his political life in his hands, and that he would probably be sacrificed to an insensate opposition to the Administration of the Government. And if he thus prophesied, if he thus felt, the result has justified it. I am a partisan in politics. Sometimes I am charged with being too much so, but if I had it within my power, as a monument of the appreciation of the American people, GEORGE GRAY should be continued in a high position in this Government. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Now, what was done at Paris that ought not to have been done? What act? Has there been any criticism? Has anybody said that our peace commissioners ought, under the demand of Spain, to have surrendered those islands to the domination of Spain? And here our friends are confronted with a most troublesome question, and the differences of opinion are so wide and so irreconcilable that I shall only point them out. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. CARMACK] said the other day that he would have turned his back upon the islands and gone away; the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. JOHNSON] said yesterday in substance the same thing; and yet both of them are appealing to us from the standpoint of love of humanity. Love of humanity! A love of humanity that would have dictated that when we had our foot upon the neck of our fallen foe, we should have turned him loose to continue his barbarism of three hundred years upon the peaceful, liberty-loving citizens of the archipelago of the Philippines.

Mr. CARMACK. Will the gentleman permit me?

Mr. GROSVENOR. Certainly.

Mr. CARMACK. I made my statement that I believed the people of the United States ought to sail away from the city of Manila and from the Philippine Islands, not because I believed it would turn the people of those islands over to Spain, but because I knew that Spain has been practically driven from the islands, and that for the United States to leave the islands would simply be to turn them over to the people of the Philippines.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Why, the army of Spain, four times the size of our army there, is on the Philippine Islands to-day and has never been taken away, but would have been taken away long ago except for two reasons—two things which I will point out. First, because there sprang up a political idea in this country that assaults upon the Administration could be successfully made by the cry of "heathen" and "savages," and all that sort of thing, and because there was just intelligence enough in those savages to hope that that cry might drive the President of the United States to prepare to enforce his authority on those islands.

But I am coming along down. The gentleman from Indiana would give them liberty. And here I want to call the attention of the House and of the gentleman from Indiana, who I know will not fail to appreciate the fair purpose I have, at least. I listened yesterday with the utmost attention to every word of the gentleman's speech, and I understood him to say that when the treaty had been signed at Paris, or at some time during the pendency of the protocol of peace, if the President had sent some message to the Philippines, giving them some assurance of the kindly purpose of this Government toward the establishment of their rights and liberty, Aguinaldo would not have been an offensive element and that peace and harmony would have been the result.

Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana. I did not say it.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Well, that was the spirit of it. The complaint was twice made by the gentleman, as will appear in his speech when printed, a criticism of the President for having failed to make known to the Filipinos his purpose.

Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana. I criticise him for not making it known now.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Well, I will come to that, my friend, a little later.

Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana. I am simply trying to set you right.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Then let it be that way. That is better for my purpose by far. You are criticising the President because he has not yet let the Filipinos know what his purpose is. It would be a disgrace to us; and the President of the United States will never be a usurper of authority, if I know him. Quietly and with dignity he has discharged the duties of his office thus far without any encroachment upon the dignity and rights of Congress. Never once has he failed to recognize the authority of Congress; and I stand here to say that the sole and only power under the Constitution that William McKinley as President of the United States has the right to exercise in the islands of the Philippines is to take military possession of them and make known to them and this country his purpose in so doing—and as to all that is in the future, all that is to come after us, all of the future disposition of these great questions, the President of the United States is the adviser of Congress—and the right of veto; and beyond that he has nothing to do with these questions.

So the criticism of the President falls to the ground. He can not make war, but he can negotiate a treaty of peace. He has done so. He did not make the war, but he has negotiated the treaty of peace. He could send that treaty to the Senate of the United States and await their action, and even if the delay in that body shall fill a hundred thousand graves and make widows and orphans in this country, he is powerless to turn another wheel, except to exercise his right as Commander in Chief of the Army and hold these possessions until the treaty is acted upon. And let me tell gentlemen, not of this House, but in the country at large, ye who are clamoring for the prolongation of this struggle, you who desire to defeat this treaty of peace—let me tell you that at your doors and upon your skirts will rest the blood of the men who are being sacrificed to-day in the Philippine Islands. [Loud applause on the Republican side.] The people of this country are not blind. They move slowly, but they move with unerring instinct, with the necessary results ahead of them.

Now let us see how the President has discharged his duty in the Philippines. He found himself by the accidents of war in possession of the Philippines. Do not quibble with me——

Mr. TERRY. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question right there? If we were in possession of the Philippine Islands, due to the magnificent victory of Dewey, why did our commissioners agree to pay $20,000,000 for them?

Mr. GROSVENOR. Will the gentleman tell me another thing? When our flag was floating from the halls of the Montezumas, when she was bathed in the brine of the Gulf of Mexico, when we were in possession of Mexico by superior power, why did our Government, in the spirit of magnanimity, give that country $15,000,000? [Loud applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. TERRY. Why did not the gentleman answer my question, which is pertinent to this discussion, instead of asking me another?

Mr. GROSVENOR. That is the Yankee of it.

Mr. TERRY. Answer my question.

Mr. GROSVENOR. The trouble is my question answers your question.

Mr. TERRY. Will you answer me that question before the American people?

Mr. GROSVENOR. If the gentleman will keep quiet, I will answer his question.

Mr. TERRY. I ask the gentleman for information, because I know he has it.

Mr. GROSVENOR. There will be no evasion about it. We were in possession, constructively, of the Philippine Islands. We entered into a treaty stipulation which involved the turning over of certain public works, certain results of a recent expenditure of large sums of public money, and Spain lay crushed. The American people were proud and haughty, and they were generous and benevolent; and in the interest of appealing to the world that we were willing to deal justly, equitably, and generously with the Kingdom of Spain, they gave them $20,000,000. [Renewed applause on the Republican side.]

Oh, my country, in the light of the magnificence of this war——

Mr. TERRY. If we had——

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio declines to be further interrupted.

Mr. TERRY. I do not wonder that he declines to yield to further questions.

Mr. GROSVENOR. In the light of these days, in the light of the splendid achievements of the past, I will not discuss the question of the comparatively puny sum of $20,000,000 that this commission has agreed to give.

But now I am going back to where I left off, to see whether the President of the United States has done that which the gentleman says he ought to have done. I hold in my hand an Executive proclamation dated on the 21st day of December, 1898, and addressed, through the Secretary of War, to the people of the Philippine Islands. And before I read this proclamation or any part of it, I beg that you will allow me to say that this unhung barbarian, this vile traitor who twice sold his country's honor for money, this gentleman who is so well depicted as a traitor of traitors, a man who has developed apparently the highest attributes of a bad man under the distinction made by a gentleman in New York some time ago, that "he wouldn't stay bought"—this man took that proclamation——

Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana. To whom does the gentleman refer?

Mr. GROSVENOR. To your George Washington II. [Laughter.]

Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana. That man was good enough to be our ally.

Mr. GROSVENOR. An ally ought to be true, and if he was our ally it was his duty to have stood with us to the end. Benedict Arnold was our ally, but did that prevent the American people from branding him for all time as the greatest criminal traitor that ever lived? Times change, but I want to show you, I was trying to show you, that this man took this proclamation of our President and, as is reported, burned it up and shot the men who attempted to publish it. I am going to read a little portion of it, but in my remarks I will publish the whole of it. Consider it as having been read, and let me comment on two or three points in it.

EXECUTIVE MANSION, Washington, December 21, 1898.

SIR: The destruction of the Spanish fleet in the harbor of Manila by the United States naval squadron commanded by Rear-Admiral Dewey, followed by the reduction of the city and the surrender of the Spanish forces, practically effected the conquest of the Philippine Islands and the suspension of Spanish sovereignty therein.

With the signature of the treaty of peace between the United States and Spain by their respective plenipotentiaries at Paris on the 10th instant and as the result of the victories of American arms, the future control, disposition, and government of the Philippine Islands are ceded to the United States. In fulfillment of the rights of sovereignty thus acquired and the responsible obligations of government thus assumed, the actual occupation and administration of the entire group of the Philippine Islands become immediately necessary, and the military government heretofore maintained by the United States in the city, harbor, and bay of Manila is to be extended with all possible dispatch to the whole of the ceded territory.

In performing this duty the military commander of the United States is enjoined to make known to the inhabitants of the Philippine Islands that, in succeeding to the sovereignty of Spain, in severing the former political relations of the inhabitants and in establishing a new political power, the authority of the United States is to be exerted for the security of the persons and property of the people of the islands, and for the confirmation of all their rights and relations. It will be the duty of the commander of the forces of occupation to announce and proclaim in the most public manner that we come, not as invaders or conquerors, but as friends to protect the natives in their homes, in their employments, and in their personal and religious rights. All persons who, either by active aid or by honest submission, cooperate with the Government of the United States to give effect to these beneficent purposes will receive the reward of its support and protection. All others will be brought within the lawful rule we have assumed, with firmness if need be, but with out severity so far as may be possible.

Within the absolute domain of military authority, which necessarily is and must remain supreme in the ceded territory until the legislation of the United States shall otherwise provide, the municipal laws of the territory in respect to private rights and property and the repression of crime are to be considered as continuing in force, and to be administered by the ordinary tribunals, so far as practicable. The operations of civil and municipal government are to be performed by such officers as may accept the supremacy of the United States by taking the oath of allegiance, or by officers chosen, as far as may be practicable, from the inhabitants of the islands.

While we control all the public property and the revenues of the State passes with the cession, and while the use and management of all public means of transportation are necessarily reserved to the authority of the United States, private property, whether belonging to individuals or corporations, is to be respected, except for cause duly established. The taxes and duties heretofore payable by the inhabitants to the late Government become payable to the authorities of the United States, unless it be seen fit to substitute for them other reasonable rates or modes of contribution to the expenses of Government, whether general or local. If private property be taken for military use, it shall be paid for, when possible, in cash, at a fair valuation, and when payment in cash is not practicable receipts are to be given.

All ports and places in the Philippine Islands in the actual possession of the land and naval forces of the United States will be opened to the commerce of all friendly nations. All goods and wares not prohibited for military reasons, by due announcement of the military authority, will be admitted upon payment of such duties and other charges as shall be in force at the time of their importation.

Finally, it should be the earnest and paramount aim of the military administration to win the confidence, respect, and affection of the inhabitants of the Philippines by assuring to them in every possible way that full measure of individual rights and liberties which is the heritage of free peoples, and by proving to them that the mission of the United States is one of benevolent assimilation, substituting the mild sway of justice and right for arbitrary rule. In the fulfillment of this high mission, supporting the temperate administration of affairs for the greatest good of the governed, there must be sedulously maintained the strong arm of authority, to repress disturbance and to overcome all obstacles to the bestowal of the blessings of good and stable government upon the people of the Philippine Islands under the free flag of the United States.

WILLIAM MCKINLEY.

To the SECRETARY OF WAR.

With the signature of the treaty of peace between the United States and Spain by their respective plenipotentiaries at Paris on the 10th instant, and as the result of the victories of American arms, the future control, disposition, and government of the Philippine Islands are ceded to the United States.

Ceded by whom? By the terms of the treaty. Now that we are there in constructive possession, no matter if we have not got a soldier on every square foot, under the law of nations when the power holding the sovereignty yielded to us one foot of land there our authority extended clear back to the verge of the country.

Now, first he points out to the Filipinos what has been done, what has been the legal result of the transfer by the Spanish Government to the United States, and now he tells them what the effect is upon them:

The authority of the United States is to be exerted for the security of the persons and property of the people of the islands and for the confirmation of all their rights and relations.

What do you say to that? What rights and what relations? The President of the United States was not defining their rights; he had no power to do it. He was not defining their relations; he had no power to do it. The President said to them, "We come to take possession of that which has been surrendered to us by Spain, and we give notice to you that your rights shall be protected."

Then he goes further:

It will be the duty of the commander of the forces of occupation to announce and proclaim in the most public manner that we come, not as invaders or conquerors, but as friends, to protect the natives in their homes, in their employments, and in their personal and religious rights.

What more could you do than that? There is no other alternative, no other thing to do, except when Spain had signed the treaty, and it had been ratified, to turn the islands over and run away from them. And when this nation does it, the men or set of men who bring it about will be damned for all eternity, the nation will be disgraced, until the Cuban republic will be an honor among the nations of the earth in comparison. [Applause.]

Within the absolute domain of military authority, which necessarily is and must remain supreme in the ceded territory until the legislation of the United States shall otherwise provide.

That is all there was of it, and that is all there is of it.

Finally—

Says the President—

Finally, it should be the earnest and paramount aim of the military administration to win the confidence, respect, and affection of the inhabitants of the Philippines by assuring to them in every possible way that full measure of individual rights and liberties which is the heritage of free peoples.

And that, says the President of the United States, is the purpose for which our Army has gone there, and, Mr. Chairman, while the world shall stand, while intelligent judgment of men shall be brought to bear upon the things on earth, the intelligent judgment of mankind will say that but for the two things I have spoken of there would have been peace and cooperation in the Philippines to-day. Early in the campaign the eruption began in New England, and broke out again when Carnegie shouted, and some other persons came over and with a conglomeration of political ideas began to agitate the American people; and here stood the Representative that to-day is insulting and demanding of the President of the United States that he shall define his position, telegraphing or sending his communications to the Philippines all that had been done, and the resistance of the ratification of the treaty of peace became the watchword of a great body in this country.

Then it was for the first time that any considerable opposition to the power and the authority of the American Army and the American Administration to establish and protect the personal, religious, and property rights of the people of these islands was resisted by Aguinaldo and his people. To-day Admiral Dewey sends word—I meant to have brought it here and read it—in a letter to his nephew, "If you will ratify the treaty of peace and teach these fellows that they will not be supported by a great political party in the United States"—I am giving the substance—"there will be an end of strife, and peace will be established." [Applause.]

Great God of my country! Is party necessity and personal hostility of so much value in this country that the peace of the country is to be destroyed? Is the party politics of this country a matter of so great importance that it is wise and just to impede the progress of this Union toward the settlement of these mighty questions?

The gentleman from Indiana says that Porto Rico is satisfied with our occupation; but there is in that case just as good an illustration as in the other of the failure of the governed to give their consent. I hope the gentleman will not tell the General of the Army that he only went over there to receive the assent of the Porto Rican people. The fact about it was that the Porto Rican people found an army there too strong for their resistance; they did not like Spain very well anyhow, and they said, "We can not go to war with the United States;" and "the consent of the governed" was found when twelve, fifteen, or seventeen thousand magnificent troops were marching over the island in the direction of San Juan.

A gentleman over here says——

Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana. Does the gentleman from Ohio take the ground that the people of Porto Rico are opposed to our domination?

Mr. GROSVENOR. No, indeed. And if your friend Aguinaldo were only in purgatory the people of the Philippines would stand side by side shouting with the people of Porto Rico to-day. [Applause.]

Before my time shall expire, as I do not want to be accused of not answering a question of the gentleman from Tennessee (I hope he hears me) I will answer him now. He wants to know what right we have in Cuba to send troops there. Why, let me say to the gentleman that we were all unanimous about one thing. We said we were not going to own Cuba. I am ready to take that back whenever we have a fair expression of the will of the governed. And we said: "We are going there to establish a stable government." Well, under the treaty Spain got out; and we had a right to go ahead and do that which was the keynote of our war with Spain; that is what we did.

Mr. CARMACK. To what gentleman from Tennessee is the gentleman from Ohio now referring?

Mr. GROSVENOR. The older gentleman, the more—well, the man of longest experience. [Laughter.]

So we have gone to Cuba under the very terms of our proclamation of war; and to-day I have received a letter, which I hold in my hand, stating that there are 28,000 Spanish troops in the province of Santa Clara getting away as fast as they can. And we are sending troops there to preserve order. And what else are we doing? We are putting the native Cubans into such power and places as they are fit to occupy. They are building railroads and telegraphs.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Ohio has expired.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I wish I had five minutes more.

Mr. HULL. I am crowded tremendously for time; but I will yield the gentleman five minutes more.

Mr. GROSVENOR. And we are giving to that island the hope of the future, which they never had before. Is it possible that in this country there is a great political party, or a great body of men—I will not say a political party—unwilling that the blessings of our Government shall be extended to the Philippine Islands?

Mr. Chairman, all this must be done by the American people by some sort of concord in support of the Administration of the Government. I was led to say what I did say personal to the President of the United States because I felt there ought to be here something in the form of a challenge to any man to say, first, that the President had deviated from the course mapped out for him by Congress, or, second, to assert that he has usurped any authority that he was not compelled to assume. And above all else I desired to say that in my humble judgment the future of the Philippines is a question for the future.

The question now is our duty to-day. All that is to come in the future is a question that stands behind the veil. The vast curtains that veil the future are all luminous to me with the glories of coming day. And I shall answer now once more the gentleman from Indiana by saying that it would have been a usurpation upon the part of the President to send to Congress a statement that he desired to do this or that in relation to the Philippine Islands at this time. He has done his whole duty. Assaults upon him fall as broken arrows at the foot of his integrity, his patriotism, and his great leadership of the mighty hosts of the majority of the American people. [Applause.]

Mr. CARMACK. I would like to ask the gentleman a question. I understood him to say that it would be impossible for the President of the United States to make any statement to Congress with reference to the policy of his Administration toward the Philippine Islands?

Mr. GROSVENOR. The policy in the future, as to the disposition of the islands, until after the ratification of this treaty. Until that time it would be brutum fulmen—nothing but the declaration of a man undertaking to act outside of his jurisdiction.

Mr. CARMACK. Would it not be just as proper for the President to send a recommendation to Congress with reference to the Philippines as to send his recommendation, as he did, with reference to Cuba—to state his views, his policy? Why should he not say with reference to the Philippine Islands as he did with reference to Cuba, "Forcible annexation would be criminal aggression"?

Mr. GROSVENOR. Would it not be a beautiful spectacle——

Mr. CARMACK. I think it would be—beautiful.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Would it not be a beautiful spectacle to put forward to the world a plan of action when the defining of that plan of action is exclusively the duty of Congress, and while Congress has in its possession the open question whether we shall have war or peace in the future?

Mr. CARMACK. The case was the same with reference to Cuba, but the President made a statement of his policy with reference to that island.

Mr. GROSVENOR. The President has made no statement of his policy with regard to Cuba since the treaty was signed.

Mr. CARMACK. He did. He said that "forcible annexation would be criminal aggression."

Mr. GROSVENOR. That was before the war and the treaty.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Ohio has expired.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I add one of the most unanswerable arguments upon all these questions yet made in this country. The author is an eminent lawyer, and his arguments are of priceless value.

[Address by Charles A. Gardiner on the question of expansion.]

THE CONSTITUTIONALITY AND VALIDITY OF THE ADMINISTRATION'S POLICY DEFENDED—OTHER PAPERS.

ALBANY, January 18, 1899.

The State Bar Association opened its second day's session at 10.30 o'clock. Charles A. Gardiner, of New York, was the first speaker. His address was on "Our right to acquire and hold foreign territory." It follows:

The sovereign nations of the world possess equal rights and equal powers. Their equality is perfect, their independence absolute. Between them national constitutions are unknown. In external or international relations the United States is assumed by all other sovereignties to possess absolute powers, unrestrained by constitutional limitations. That assumption is correct, based upon the fundamental canon of the law of nations. The United States may ratify its proposed treaty with Spain, and no other nation has any right to question its political or constitutional authority to do so.

Are there, therefore, no limitations on our national sovereignty? During the colonial period, as Mr. Justice Iredell explained, the British monarchs were sovereign, and the colonists their subjects; but after the Revolution sovereignty passed to and vested in the people (3 Dall., 93), and there it remains vested to-day in the 75,000,000 American citizens, not as individuals, but as a political and sovereign unit. Historically this unit preceded both State and Federal constitutions. It created them.

The Declaration of Independence, the supreme act of sovereignty, gave birth to the nation, while the Constitution gave form to its government. The Constitution is but a law of the people, distributing, not creating, sovereign powers among the several organs of sovereignty. A vast residuum of power, not disposed of by the Constitution, is "reserved to the States, respectively, or to the people" (Article X).

Although the distinction is not expressly made in the Constitution, the consensus of decisions for a century, as well as the logic of the situation, makes the following deductions irresistible: In all internal and domestic relations the States possess the sovereignty originally vested in the people, except such as the Constitution specifically grants to the Federal Government; where there is no such grant the National Government has no power; authority resides in the State governments exclusively. In all external and international relations the rule is reversed. The Federal Government possesses every sovereign power not expressly prohibited by the Constitution. If the Constitution is silent, the Federal Government, directly representing the sovereign people, is duly constituted agent and trustee to exercise such sovereignty. The States have no national powers whatever.

Early in the century Chief Justice Marshall announced as a proposition which should "command the universal assent of mankind," that the Government of the Union "is supreme within its sphere of action. * * * It is the Government of all; its powers are delegated by all; it represents all, and acts for all." (4 Wheat., 405.)

Chief Justice Chase reiterated this sentiment: "The people of the United States constitute one nation under one Government, and this Government within the scope of its powers is supreme." (7 Wall., 76.)

The idea was elaborated by Mr. Justice Bradley: "The United States is not only a government * * * it is invested with power over all the foreign relations of the country, war, peace, and negotiations and intercourse with other nations, all which are forbidden to the State governments." (12 Wall., 565.)

In the Chinese exclusion cases the court held: "The United States, in their relation to foreign countries, are one nation invested with powers which belong to independent nations." (130 U. S., 604.)

And Mr. Justice Lamar in the Neagle case used this language: "The Federal Government is the exclusive representative and embodiment of the entire sovereignty of the nation in its united character. * * * In our intercourse with foreign nations, States and State governments and the internal adjustment of Federal power, with its complex system of checks and balances, are unknown, and the only authority those nations are permitted to deal with is the authority of the nation as a unit." (135 U. S., 84.)

RIGHT TO ACQUIRE TERRITORY.

I. Right to acquire.—The United States possessing every attribute of the most potential sovereignty, and, in the felicitous language of Mr. Justice Lamar, the Federal Government in all external relations being "the exclusive representative and embodiment of the entire sovereignty of the nation," it follows that any power possessed by any sovereignty is possessed by the United States; and unless specifically prohibited by the Constitution can be exercised without restriction by the Federal Government.

The war and treaty making powers are not created by the Constitution; it merely designates agencies to exercise them. No one assumes that had such agencies not been designated this nation could not have waged the wars and made the treaties of our history. The nation needs no express grant of power for an international act, and it has specific authority for extremely few. It had none when it laid the embargo act of 1807, nor when it extended sovereignty over Bering Sea or the Guano Islands.

The right to acquire territory irrespective of its situs, contiguous or foreign, by conquest, treaty, purchase, or discovery, is an acknowledged and well-established attribute of sovereignty, and has been exercised by sovereigns from the beginning of recorded history. No one pretends that the right is specifically renounced in the Constitution. Hence it remains an attribute of the sovereign people, and Congress and the President, the sole agents and trustees of that sovereignty, have exclusive and unrestricted right to exercise it.

I advance the proposition with deference that this right is itself a primary and substantive attribute of sovereignty, as is the right of national existence or self-defense, and I shall regard it in this discussion as the primary and fundamental authority for territorial expansion.

The right to acquire is also derived from the enumerated constitutional powers to declare war and to make treaties. "The Constitution confers absolutely on the Government of the Union the powers of making war and of making treaties," said Chief Justice Marshall, first advancing the theory; "consequently that Government possesses the power of acquiring territory either by conquest or by treaty." (1 Pet., 542).

"The power of the United States to acquire new territory by cession or conquest," in the opinion of Mr. Justice Story, "does not depend upon any specific grant in the Constitution to do so, but flows as an incidental power from its sovereignty over war and treaties." (Constitution, section 1287.)

And Mr. Justice Bradley, in the Mormon Church Case, said: "The power to acquire territory * * * is derived from the treaty-making power and the power to declare and carry on war. The incidents of these powers are those of national sovereignty, and belong to all independent governments." (136 U. S., 42.)

The right to acquire was also derived by Chief Justice Taney from the express power of Congress to admit new States. "The power to expand the territory of the United States by the admission of new States is plainly given," he said. "It has been held to authorize the acquisition of territory, not fit for admission at the time, but to be admitted as soon as its population and situation would entitle it to admission." (19 How., 447.)

RIGHT TO HOLD AND GOVERN IT.

II. Right to hold and govern.—Possessing the right to acquire territory, it follows as an inevitable consequence that we also possess the right to hold, and hence to govern it. (Story, Const., section 1324.)

In 1810 Chief Justice Marshall announced these views: "The power of governing and of legislating for a Territory is the inevitable consequence of the right to acquire and to hold territory." (6 Cranch., 336.)

"And whatever may be the source whence the power is derived," he said, in a later case, "the possession of it is unquestioned." (1 Pet., 542.)

"It would be absurd," was the opinion of Mr. Justice Bradley, "to hold that the United States has power to acquire territory and no power to govern it when acquired." (136 U. S., 42-44.)

Mr. Justice Matthews said, of our right to hold and govern: "That question is, we think, no longer open to discussion. It has passed beyond the stage of controversy into final judgment." (114 U. S., 44.)

And Mr. Justice Gray, in a recent case thus summarized the law: "The United States having rightfully acquired the Territories * * * have the entire dominion and sovereignty, national and municipal, Federal and State, over all the Territories." (152 U. S., 48.)

The right to acquire being a primary attribute of sovereignty, and the right to hold and govern being ancillary thereto, it follows that wherever our sovereignty extends, there our right to acquire, and hence to hold and govern, extends also. The situs of the territory is immaterial; it may be contiguous or remote; on the American continent or in foreign lands. Our abstract right to acquire and hold is as plenary and sovereign in the Philippines as in Alaska or Arizona.

POLITICAL QUESTIONS.

III. All problems of expansion political, not constitutional or judicial.—Before considering the concrete application of these rights, it is important to determine their precise governmental character. Are they political or judicial? The public mind is so confused on all problems of expansion that it bases every objection thereto on assumed violations of the Constitution. Political questions differ from judicial in that none but the sovereigns can determine them. A sovereign decides by his own will, sic volo, sic jubeo. A court decides according to the law prescribed by the sovereign. Political power is that which a sovereign exerts by its own authority; judicial power is that which a sovereign grants to its own courts. Political power is sovereign and plenary, while judicial power is derivative and limited.

The "maintenance and extension of our national dominion" is a political and not a judicial problem. The reasons are thus stated: "The President and Congress are vested with all the responsibility and powers of the Government for the determination of questions as to the maintenance and extension of our national dominion. It is not the province of the courts to participate in the discussion or decision of these questions, for they are of a political nature and not judicial. Congress and the President having assumed jurisdiction and sovereignty, * * * all the people and courts of the country are bound by such governmental acts." (50 Fed. Rep., 110.)

The acquisition of territory by treaty is, therefore, political and nonjudicial. The Senate can ratify, reject, or modify any treaty. There is no limitation upon its treaty-making powers. It modified a draft treaty with England in 1706, with France in 1801, with Norway and Sweden in 1818, with Mexico in 1848, and with Bolivia in 1862. It rejected many, among them the treaty of arbitration with England in 1896, and many it has ratified without change. The action of the President and Congress will be final as to all international and political phases of the pending treaty. If a court could modify or annul a treaty in these respects, it could, as suggested by Mr. Justice Miller, "annul declarations of war, suspend the levy of armies, and become a great international arbiter instead of a court of justice for the administration of the laws of the United States." (1 Woolw., 156.) And referring particularly to the acquisition of new territory by treaty, the Supreme Court said: "This court has solemnly and repeatedly declared that this was a matter peculiarly belonging to the cognizance of the legislative and executive departments, and that the propriety of their determination was not within the province of the judiciary to contravene or question." (9 How., 153.)

All questions also incident to acquisition and preliminary to government, whether the territory be contiguous or remote; whether our tenure be temporary or permanent; whether we keep, or give back, or sell, or lease—these are all political problems, intrusted without appeal to the discretion of Congress. (14 Pet., 538; 9 How., 242; 18 Wall., 320; 101 U. S., 133.)

CONSTITUTION NOT INVOLVED.

The same is emphatically true of the government of new territory. It belongs, as the Supreme Court has ruled, "primarily to Congress, and secondarily to such agencies as Congress may establish" (13 Wall., 319). "Territories are not organized under the Constitution, * * * but are creations exclusively of the legislative department, and subject to its supervision and control" (9 How., 243). "Congress has full and complete legislative authority over the people of the Territories and all the departments of the Territorial governments" (101 U. S., 132). In ordaining Territorial governments "all the discretion which belongs to legislative power is vested in Congress" (114 U. S., 44). Also, "In a Territory all the functions of government are within the legislative jurisdiction of Congress" (86 Fed. R., 459). And finally, all Territorial powers "are created by Congress," and all Territorial acts "are subject to Congressional supervision" (139 U. S., 446).

Hence, again, whether our new territory be organized or unorganized, governed directly or indirectly, temporarily or permanently; whether the Constitution and Federal statutes be made operative, or new rules and regulations be enacted—these and all other problems of government are political and not judicial.

IV. Concrete application of rights—Extent and means of exercise.—Our abstract rights and their governmental character being thus determined, we will next consider their concrete application, and the extent to which and the means by which they can be exercised.

The power to "dispose of territory," under Article IV, section 3, of the Constitution, is not alternative to the power to rule and regulate. Both powers are granted and are unlimited (8 Wheat., 580). Congress can "dispose of" Porto Rico or the Philippines as unreservedly as it can dispose of personal property; the prizes, for example, captured in the late war (14 Pet., 536). We may cede the Philippines to the inhabitants thereof, as a gift, or on such terms as may be agreed. We may let them to tenants, as China is leasing its ports to European powers. We may sell them to any bidder—England, Germany, Japan—as Russia sold Alaska to us.

The right to acquire territory being a primary attribute of sovereignty, and being therefore general and plenary, and the right to hold, and hence to govern, being a corollary of the right to acquire, it follows that such right, irrespective of the Constitution, belongs to the United States as fully and completely as a similar right could belong to any sovereign nation. So far as rights are concerned, if England can hold, and hence govern, colonies, so can we. If Russia has the right to exercise sovereignty over Port Arthur, we have an equal right of sovereignty to rule the Philippines.

In the absence of constitutional provision, this attribute of sovereignty might have been exercised by the Executive, by Congress, or by both. But the Constitution specifically designates Congress as the sole agent of sovereignty "to make all needful rules and regulations respecting the territory of the United States" (Article IV, section 3); and the decisions of the Supreme Court are uniform that these words alone empower Congress to regulate or rule territories in the manner and by the means it chooses—ranging from a joint protectorate, such as we extend over Samoa, to a fully organized Territorial government, such as we maintain in Arizona.

SAMOA AND GUANO ISLANDS.

In 1872 Pango Pango Harbor, by a treaty of cession, was "given up to the American Government," but until recently we had not even established our sovereignty over the harbor, merely exercising a protectorate over Samoa jointly with England and Germany. (1 Whart. Dig., 436.) The guano act declares that any island discovered by an American citizen shall be "considered as appertaining to the United States." (U. S. Rev. Stat., section 5570.) Under this act we hold and exercise not merely a protectorate, but actual, though tenuous, governmental authority over Navassa, Roncados, Howland, Baker, and several other guano islands. (137 U. S., 206, 647; 25 Fed. R., 675; 44 Barb., 23.)

PROVISIONAL GOVERNMENTS.

The President now maintains provisional military governments in Cuba, Porto Rico, and the Philippines—provisional upon the ratification of the treaty and upon the subsequent action of Congress. Upon ratification, and until Congress makes "rules and regulations," the President may continue these governments. Many precedents are furnished by our history—during and after the Mexican war in Tamaulipas and California, and after the rebellion in Florida, Alabama, and Arkansas from 1865 to 1868, in Mississippi and Georgia from 1865 to 1869, and in Virginia and Texas from 1865 to 1870.

The President may also, in his discretion, abolish military rule and establish provisional civil governments—provisional again until Congress enacts "rules and regulations." Such was the first and only American civil government established in California prior to statehood. (16 How., 193.) Concerning it the Supreme Court said: The civil government of California "had its origin in the lawful exercise of a belligerent right over a conquered territory. * * * It did not cease as a matter of course or as a necessary consequence of the restoration of peace. The President might have dissolved it by withdrawing the army and navy officers who administered it, but he did not do so. Congress could have put an end to it, but that was not done. The right inference from the inaction of both is that it was meant to be continued until it had been legislatively changed. * * * It must be presumed that the delay was consistent with the true policy of the Government." This provisional civil government was continued after the treaty of peace until California was admitted to the Union and its legality and powers were sustained by the Supreme Court. (16 How., 190.) Until Congress acts it will be the duty of the President under his war power to maintain in the ceded territory such military or civil rule as he chooses (20 Wall., 324; 16 How., 190), and the precedents furnish him ample political and judicial support.

COLONIES DEFINED.

Congress, however, whenever it determines to exercise its prerogatives, can govern the new acquisitions as "organized" or "unorganized" territories, directly or indirectly, temporarily or permanently. "Dependencies" or "provinces," as defined by our courts, are territories already partially or wholly settled, distinct from the sovereign State, but belonging to it and subject to the laws and regulations it may prescribe (3 Wash. C. C. Rep., 286). "Colonies" are territories settled by citizens of the sovereign or parent State (3 Wash. C. C. Rep., 286); "unions of citizens or subjects who have left their country to people another and remain subject to the mother country" (Bouv., Tit. Colony). Porto Rico and the Philippines, already densely populated and affording no opportunity for American colonization, can not, under our decisions, be strictly designated "colonies."

TERRITORIES DEFINED.

"Organized territories" are portions of the public domain over which Congress has extended our Constitution and laws, and has established a system of organized local government, such as Arizona, New Mexico, and Oklahoma (Rev. Stat., sections 1839-1895). "Unorganized territories" possess no organized local government, are usually not subject to our Constitution and laws, and are ruled directly by Congress. Such are Alaska and Indian Territory. Territories, dependencies, and provinces are in our jurisprudence practically synonymous terms. "Territories" in legal contemplation are organized or unorganized dependencies or provinces. The phrase has been incorporated in our political and judicial history for a century, and if we should designate Hawaii, Cuba, Porto Rico, and the Philippines as "territories" it would be more in harmony with American institutions than to style them "colonies."

CONGRESS HAS ABSOLUTE POWER OVER TERRITORIES.

Congress has the same power over its public domain as over any other property belonging to the United States (29 Fed. R., 205; 14 Pet., 537; 18 Wall., 319; 136 U. S., 42). "This power," said the Supreme Court, "is vested in Congress without limitation, and has been considered the foundation upon which Territorial governments rest" (14 Pet., 537). The Supreme Court early announced the comprehensive principle that "Territories are not organized under the Constitution nor subject to its complex distribution of the powers of government as the organic law, but are the creations exclusively of the legislative department and subject to its supervision and control" (9 How., 242).

Chief Justice Waite, sustaining this power of Congress, said: "All territory within the jurisdiction of the United States not included in any State must, necessarily, be governed by or under the authority of Congress. * * * It has full and complete legislative authority over the people of the Territories and all the departments of the Territorial governments" (101 U. S., 132). In a later case the court decided that "in ordaining government for the Territories all the discretion which belongs to the legislative power is vested in Congress" (114 U. S., 44).

"The power of Congress over all Territories is general and plenary," said Mr. Justice Bradley (136 U. S., 42). And the court, summarizing the whole matter, announced this opinion through Mr. Justice Brewer: "A territory is a political community, organized by Congress, all whose powers are created by Congress, and all whose acts are subject to Congressional supervision" (139 U. S., 446).

Under this full and comprehensive authority the form of local civil government first compels attention. It is absolutely in Congressional discretion. "All the discretion which belongs to legislative power is vested in Congress," said the Supreme Court, "and that extends * * * to determining by law from time to time the form of the local government in a particular Territory" (114 U. S., 44). "There can be no question," said Judge Dawson, "of the authority of Congress to enact such forms of Territorial government within the Territories as it may choose or deem best" (29 Fed. R., 205).

MAY RULE FROM WASHINGTON.

All the functions of government being within legislative discretion, Congress may exercise them directly from Washington, or indirectly through organized local rule. (86 Fed. Rep., 459; 18 Wall., 319; 114 U. S., 44.) It may, as succinctly put by Judge Morrow, "legislate in accordance with the separate needs of each locality, and vary its regulations to meet the conditions and circumstances of the people." (86 Fed. Rep., 459.)

In the language of Chief Justice Waite, "Congress may not only abrogate laws of the Territorial legislatures, but it may itself legislate directly for the local government. It may make a void act of the Territorial legislature valid and a valid act void." (101 U. S., 132.) It is true that Congress, with few exceptions, has not directly enacted the municipal laws of Territories, but this is a matter of legislative discretion, not a constitutional obligation, and Congress may, if it chooses, enact at Washington all municipal laws for Hawaii, Porto Rico, and the Philippines, as it does now for the District of Columbia and Alaska. (152 U. S., 48; 101 U. S., 133; 114 U. S., 44; 1 Deady, 31; 86 Fed. Rep., 459.)

OUR FORMER COLONIES.

Under the ordinance of 1787, as subsequently modified, the Territories of Ohio, Mississippi, Indiana, Michigan, and Illinois had a governor, judges, and council appointed or selected by Congress; governments as purely colonial, except for a Delegate in Congress, as any to-day maintained by England, Germany, or France.

Orleans Territory, a part of the Louisiana purchase, existed from 1803 to 1811, and furnished another example of colonial administration—a local legislature, a governor exercising the functions of the old Spanish intendant, a justiciary administering the old Spanish code—all appointed by the President; Federal statutes operative only in criminal cases, and a separate port law for New Orleans (2 How., 344).

Of it, Nicholson, of Delaware, said: "It is in the nature of a colony whose commerce may be regulated without any reference to the Union." "It was a startling bill," remarks Benton, "continuing the existing Spanish government, putting the President in the place of the King of Spain, putting all the Territorial officers in the place of the King's officers, and placing the appointment of all these officers in the President alone." Yet the validity of the Orleans government was repeatedly sustained by the Supreme Court (2 How., 344; 3 How., 589; 13 Wall., 434). In many respects it might furnish an acceptable model of civil rule by Congress for Porto Rico, the Philippines, and even Hawaii.

ALASKA NOW A COLONY.

Alaska was ceded to us in 1867 without any treaty covenants for future admission as a State. The Constitution and Federal laws have not been made operative therein, and only such statutes have been extended over it as circumstances gradually required. It is an unorganized territory, governed directly from Washington (U. S. Rev. Stat., section 1954). Physically it is foreign territory, its nearest point being 400 miles and its farthest point 2,400 miles from Seattle. The Aleutian Islands extend even into the geographical limits of another continent. For thirty-two years a few judicial and executive, but no legislative functions of government have been conferred upon the inhabitants. "Congress," said Judge Dawson, "could confer upon Alaska such powers, judicial and executive, as they deemed most suitable to the inhabitants. It was unquestionably within the constitutional power of Congress to withhold from the inhabitants of Alaska the power to legislate and make laws." (29 Fed. R., 205.)

CAN HOLD TERRITORIES PERMANENTLY.

The right to govern Territories temporarily or permanently is equally in the discretion of Congress. The opponents of expansion urge, however, that every foot of soil acquired by this nation is impressed with a trust or franchise of statehood, and that the Constitution prohibits its acquisition except for such ultimate purpose. The permissive language of Article IV, section 3, is construed as mandatory. It is said to be unconstitutional to hold territory, even temporarily, except "in a state of pupilage," as Judge Bradley expressed it, in preparation for eventual statehood.

DRED SCOTT CASE.

This objection is based exclusively upon the decision of the Supreme Court in the Dred Scott case. Chief Justice Taney's words are now historic: "There is certainly no power given by the Constitution to the Federal Government," he said, "to establish or maintain colonies bordering on the United States or at a distance, to be ruled and governed at its own pleasure, nor to enlarge its territorial limits in any way except by the admission of new States. That power is plainly given. * * * It has been held to authorize the acquisition of territory not fit for admission at the time, but to be admitted. * * * It is acquired to become a State, and not to be held as a colony." (19 How., 446, 447.)

First. I am of opinion that this declaration is not a dictum, as often contended, but a vital part of the decision: an essential step in an elaborate argument; a point necessarily involved in deciding that the Missouri Compromise was unconstitutional and Dred Scott a slave and not a citizen.

Second. The Dred Scott decision has never been judicially reiterated. No court ever concurred in it. It precipitated the civil war. It is stamped with the bad eminence of antebellum conflicts. Its very title is odious, and sends a shudder through a reunited people. Such is the only decision quoted to-day against territorial expansion.

Third. The decision is either law or not law. It can not be valid as to colonies, a secondary consideration, and invalid as to slavery, a primary issue. It must stand or fall as a whole. Hence we have this dilemma: If to-day the Dred Scott decision is law, then the thirteenth, fourteenth, and fifteenth amendments are not law, the results of the rebellion are nullified, the Missouri Compromise was unconstitutional, slavery can be maintained in all our Territories, and the negro has "no rights which the white man is bound to respect" (19 How., 407). This dilemma has been overlooked.

Fourth. The major premise of Judge Taney's argument against colonies is that our sole authority to acquire territory is derived from the power to admit States. That proposition has never been accepted by any other judge or court. On the contrary, unanimous benches have declared our right to acquire territory irrespective of its situs, and irrespective also of any franchise of statehood, as a primary attribute of sovereignty and as a corollary of the war and treaty powers. Judge Taney's major premise has been specifically overruled three times (16 Wall., 434; 136 U. S., 42; 137 U. S., 212). The Supreme Court having held it utterly fallacious, all his arguments fall with it. His conclusion, therefore, that we can not hold Territories per se falls also, and is as dead to the American people as the stamp act or statutes against witchcraft.

Fifth. The utter futility of the declaration should be observed. It is without practical value. What right had the court to make it? What jurisdiction had it over the subject? Can an injunction restrain the Senate? Can the President be enjoined? How will the Supreme Court prohibit this sovereign nation from extending its sovereignty over conquered territory? The error is fundamental. Judge Taney's decision was intended to and did encroach upon the political power of the Government. He had no authority to do so. His decision, pro tanto, judged even by his own clear and logical utterances in other cases, was not law when uttered and is not law to-day.

Sixth. An exhaustive investigation of the writings and speeches of the founders of our Government and a scrutiny of the proceedings attending our acquisition of the Northwest, Louisiana, and Florida Territories establish beyond dispute the historic inaccuracy of Judge Taney's assertion that a trust or franchise of statehood was intended to be impressed upon all newly acquired territory. Edmund Randolph submitted to the Federal convention the first propositions relative to new States and Territories. Madison offered amendments, and then the present language was introduced into the Constitution on the motion of Gouverneur Morris.

During the controversy over the Louisiana cession in 1803 he was appealed to for information in regard to the meaning of the third section of the fourth article. He answered: "I am very certain I had it not in contemplation to insert a decree de coercendo imperio in the Constitution. I knew then as well as I do now that all North America must at length be annexed to us. (3 Mor. Writ., 185.) A few days later he again replied: "I mistook the drift of your inquiry, which substantially is whether Congress can admit as a new State territory which did not belong to the United States when the Constitution was made. In my opinion they can not. I always thought when we should acquire Canada and Louisiana it would be proper to govern them as provinces and allow them no voice in our councils. In wording the third section of the fourth article I went as far as circumstances would permit to establish the exclusion." (3 Mor. Writ., 192.)

ANTI-EXPANSIONISTS CHANGED ATTITUDE.

The opposition to acquiring Louisiana was based upon the treaty covenants guaranteeing ultimate statehood. No opposition developed to acquiring and holding per se Territories or dependencies. That right seems to have been assumed without discussion (Story, Constitution, section 1296). The resolution of the Massachusetts legislature is one of many similar public expressions: "The annexation of Louisiana to the Union transcends the constitutional power of the Government of the United States. It forms a new confederacy to which the States united by the former compact are not bound to adhere." (Life of Quincy, page 206.)

The Supreme Court has long since overruled these objections. I cite them merely to show that at the beginning of the century anti-expansionists acknowledged the nation's right to expand, insisted that new territory be governed permanently as such, and objected to its ultimate admission to statehood. At the close of the century anti-expansionists deny our right to expand, if territory be governed permanently as such, and insist that all acquisitions be converted into States.

Both legal and historic precedents are thus established for governing new acquisitions as organized or unorganized Territories, directly or indirectly, temporarily or permanently; and all such questions are political, subject to the discretion and power of Congress, and foreign to the jurisdiction of the Constitution and courts.

V. Civil rights and political status of inhabitants.—The civil rights and political status of inhabitants of ceded territory are those guaranteed by treaty and conferred by Congress. They acquire no rights under our Constitution and Federal statutes, ex proprio vigore. The Constitution makes "all treaties the supreme law of the land." (Article VI, section 2.) Treaties, as Chief Justice Marshall held, are obligatory upon the people of the United States (1 Pet., 542); and binding "as a constitutional law." (16 How., 657; 19 How., 372.) The pending treaty with Spain provides: "The civil rights and political status of the native inhabitants of the territories hereby ceded to the United States shall be determined by the Congress." (Article IX.) Hence, if Congress should ratify the treaty and do no more, that document alone would measure the civil rights and political status of the inhabitants of the ceded territory.

CONSTITUTION AND STATUTES NOT OPERATIVE.

Originally the Constitution was operative in the thirteen States which ratified the document. (Article VII, section 1.) As new States were admitted the Constitution became operative therein ex proprio vigore, even if, as in the case of Texas, it had not previously been extended over the annexed territory (143 U. S., 69). The geographical limits of Federal statutes are the national boundaries on the day of enactment. If our domain is expanded, our statutes are not ex proprio vigore expanded also.

Statutes possess no innate power of expansion. The Dingley tariff, for instance, is limited strictly to the area of the United States as it existed July 24, 1897. To make it operative over Porto Rico, the Philippines, or a single foot of new territory, a special act extending it is necessary. Even when new States are admitted, two statutes are required—one admitting to statehood, and hence to the rights of the Constitution, the other extending our laws over the admitted territory. The thirteen original States were a mere fringe along the Atlantic. By conquest, annexation, and purchase, within a hundred years we expanded our territory on this continent over 3,250,000 square miles, and over all this vast domain, with the exception of Alaska, the Constitution and laws of the Union have been made operative by more than a hundred special acts of Congress.

Prior to 1850 there was no uniformity of legislative expression, but every organized Territory then existing and every Territory subsequently organized became subject to the following section of the Revised Statutes: "The Constitution and all laws of the United States which are not locally inapplicable shall have the same force and effect within all the organized Territories and in every Territory hereafter organized as elsewhere within the United States." (Section 1891.)

In an early case Chief Justice Marshall decided that territory annexed did not ipso facto derive rights from the Constitution. Its only rights, he said, were those "stipulated in the treaty," or granted by "its new master." (1 Pet., 542.) Mr. Justice Nelson, in a subsequent case, suggested a potent reason therefor. Territories "are not," he said, "organized under the Constitution." "They are the creations exclusively of the legislative department of the Government, and subject to its supervision and control." (9 How., 252.)

If Territories are neither created nor organized nor supervised under authority of the Constitution, how can it be urged that they acquire rights from the Constitution ex proprio vigore? Consider also the remarks of Mr. Justice Bradley: "The extent of the power thus granted (to Territories) depends entirely upon the organic act of Congress in each case, and it is at all times subject to such alterations as Congress may see fit to adopt." (18 Wall., 319.) Also the words of Mr. Justice Brewer: "A Territory is a political community organized by Congress, all whose powers are created by Congress, and all whose acts are subject to Congressional supervision." (139 U. S., 446.) If all Territorial rights and powers are created by Congress, then none are created by the Constitution; if all are subject to alteration and supervision by Congress, then none are fixed and unalterable by virtue of the Constitution.

NO INALIENABLE RIGHTS.

Not only are the Constitution and laws not operative, but Congress, in creating, organizing, and supervising Territories, is not bound to grant the inhabitants any of our so-called "inalienable rights," not even those enumerated in the Constitution and its amendments, and commonly called the "bill of rights." This principle was distinctly announced by the court in an elaborate opinion in the Mormon Church case (136 U. S., 42), the consensus of all the authorities sustaining the principle that neither the letter nor the spirit of the Constitution is operative in Territories without the specific act of Congress. Although this doctrine may startle humanitarians, it was reiterated with approval by Mr. Justice Harlan in a decision of the Supreme Court on April 25 last. (170 U. S., 349.)

Ex-Senator Edmunds's recent statement is not necessarily in conflict with these views. "The Constitution," he said, "does operate and have full force in our Territories in the respects that affect the personal and civil rights of all." That is unqualifiedly true of every organized Territory since 1850. The Constitution has been specifically made operative therein. For forty-nine years the inhabitants of Arizona and New Mexico have enjoyed the same "personal and civil" rights under the Constitution as the inhabitants of New York. But if Senator Edmunds intends his statement to apply to Alaska or Porto Rico or the Philippines, or any other unorganized territory over which the Constitution and Federal statutes shall not have been specifically extended by Congress, he is opposed by uniform decisions of the Supreme Court. The inhabitants of ceded territory therefore acquire no rights from the Constitution, Federal statutes, or treaties, except such as are specifically granted. This principle has been overlooked in all pending discussions, but its logical application will solve the most perplexing problems of expansion.

First. It is urged that the inhabitants of ceded territory possess implied rights to a republican form of government. Even our Constitution guarantees only "to every State in this Union a republican form of government." (Article IV, section 4.) It guarantees no form of government whatever to a Territory. We can not put the inhabitants to the sword, but we can banish them entirely from the country and confiscate their property (8 Cranch, 122; 143 U. S., 356), or grant them any quantum of rights even to statehood. Natural rights of barbarians to a republican form of government—who can define them? None exist outside of Utopia or Plato's Republic. Whatever is granted is an act of sovereign grace. Any government, or no government, rests with Congress. Any right, or no right, is in sovereign discretion.

TAXATION WITHOUT REPRESENTATION.

Second. Taxation without representation is an equally fallacious doctrine. In 1820 Chief Justice Marshall decided that the power of Congress to tax the Territories as well as States, irrespective of representation, was "incontrovertible." "If it were true," he said, "that according to the spirit of our Constitution the power of taxation must be limited by the right of representation, whence is derived the power to lay and collect duties, imposts, and excises?" (5 Wheat., 325.)

INHABITANTS NOT CITIZENS.

Third. Inhabitants of the States of the Union have a dual citizenship, State and Federal. Article IV, section 2, guarantees to "the citizens of each State all the privileges and immunities of citizens of the several States." But this interstate citizenship is granted only to citizens of a State, not to citizens of the United States. There is no citizenship of a Territory, and the only citizenship Congress can confer is national. (92 U. S., 542.)

The fourteenth amendment provides that "All persons born or naturalized in the United States, and subject to the jurisdiction thereof, are citizens of the United States." Children of ambassadors and consuls born here are not "subject to our jurisdiction," and do not become citizens. (16 Wall., 73.) "This section," said the Supreme Court, "contemplates two sources of citizenship, and two sources only, birth and naturalization." (112 U. S., 101; 169 U. S., 702.) Persons may be naturalized either individually, under the naturalization acts, or "collectively," as the court explained, "by the force of a treaty by which foreign territory is acquired." (112 U. S., 102.) Inhabitants of Porto Rico and the Philippines not being naturalized, and the pending treaty not providing for the naturalization of either natives or Spanish subjects, it follows that they can only become citizens by a specific act of Congress.

The pending bill for Hawaii contains such naturalization provisions. The only other source of American citizenship is birth, and that must be within American territory over which the Constitution and laws shall have been specifically extended. No Constitution, no fourteenth amendment; hence no citizenship by birth. Therefore, if Congress ratifies the treaty and does no more, neither present nor future native inhabitants will be citizens; but if Congress extends our Constitution and laws over the annexed domain, all present and future native inhabitants will be endowed with Federal citizenship.

CAN PROHIBIT IMMIGRATION.

4. The inhabitants of ceded territory, not being citizens, will have no right to immigrate to this country. Their rights will be no more nor less than those of aliens of like races immigrating from any foreign land. The Chinese in the Philippines and Hawaii will be excluded absolutely under our Chinese-exclusion acts. (130 U. S., 581.) Malays, constituting a considerable proportion of the Filipinos, being neither black nor yellow, but brown, the fifth subdivision of the human race, can be excluded as absolutely as the Chinese.

It has been repeatedly suggested by the Supreme Court that the thirteenth, fourteenth, and fifteenth amendments apply only to whites and blacks and not to Chinese, and hence Malays. (16 Wall., 73; 100 U. S., 306; 112 U. S., 101; 21 Fed. Rep., 909; 5 Sawy., 155; 71 Fed. Rep., 274; 169 U. S., 697.) White and black inhabitants migrating to this country can be admitted on the same terms and no other as white and black immigrants from any foreign land. Citizenship and that alone prevents exclusion. Any United States citizen, whatever his race or origin, may, under protection of the fourteenth amendment, reenter the United States and pass from one State to another, and Federal or State governments can not deny him that right except in punishment for crime. (21 Fed. Rep., 910; 130 U. S., 581; 169 U. S., 649.)

NO CHEAP LABOR.

Hence, unless Congress confers citizenship, Caucasians and negroes will be admitted under our immigration laws, while Mongolians and Malays may be debarred absolutely, and threatened incursions of cheap labor will not imperil the interests of American workmen.

NO UNIFORM TARIFF.

5. In construing the provision of the Constitution that "all duties, imposts, and excises shall be uniform throughout the United States" (Article I, section 8), Chief Justice Marshall in 1820 defined "United States." "Does this term," he said, "designate the whole or any particular portion of the American empire? Certainly this question can admit but of one answer. It is the name given to our great Republic, which is composed of States and Territories. The District of Columbia or the territory west of the Missouri is not less within the United States than Maryland or Pennsylvania" (5 Wheat., 319).

In its ultimate analysis it included all the land owned by the nation in 1820. It includes all the land owned to-day—even Alaska and Hawaii. It will include every foot of soil that may be ceded by the pending treaty. The islands will no longer be a part of Spain; they will not be independent; they will be ours, ceded, annexed, their very soil forming a constituent portion of the physical area of the United States. Our national entity is coterminous with our physical domain, and will anyone assert that our physical domain is not coextensive with our national entity? Judge Marshall's views are thought to favor free trade. It is assumed that the uniform tariff provisions of the Constitution will become operative and compel free trade within all our borders. But are not protectionists and free traders zealously quoting Marshall and Taney and Webster and Calhoun, while they overlook a principle which renders their dispute purely academic?

DINGLEY TARIFF INOPERATIVE.

How will tariff regulations become operative? There is no provision in the treaty; hence that document does not apply. The Constitution and statutes do not operate ex proprio vigore; hence they do not apply. We find ourselves again relegated to Congress. If it makes operative the Constitution and Dingley tariff, they will be operative—otherwise not. If it enacts new tariff laws, those laws will prevail. If, however, Congress ratifies the treaty and does nothing more, leaving the adjustment of tariffs to the President as a war power, such course is equally in Congressional discretion.

TARIFF PRECEDENTS.

These principles have been applied on several occasions in our history. Louisiana was ceded in 1803; Orleans Territory was organized therefrom in 1804, and in 1812 it was admitted as the State of Louisiana. Our tariff imposed a lower duty by 25 per cent on goods imported in American than in foreign bottoms. The Louisiana treaty gave a similar reduction to French and Spanish merchantmen trading to New Orleans, thus establishing lower duties there on French and Spanish imports than elsewhere in the Union. For eight years the Territory of Orleans had an essentially different tariff system from the rest of the United States.

Florida was ceded to us in 1819. After we had taken possession it was decided by the Treasury Department that goods imported from Florida before Congress had made our laws operative therein were liable to duty. "That is," said Chief Justice Taney, "although Florida had by cession actually become a part of the United States and was in our possession, yet under our revenue laws its ports must be regarded as foreign until they are established as domestic by act of Congress." (9 How., 617.)

In 1846 the Mexican State of Tamaulipas was conquered by us. During our military and civil rule therein, and prior to the treaty of peace in 1848, there arrived at Philadelphia an American vessel, cleared from Tampico, upon whose cargo duties were exacted as from a foreign country. The Supreme Court, sustaining the tariff, said: "There was no act of Congress establishing a custom-house at Tampico nor authorizing the appointment of a collector. The regulations the collector adopted were not those prescribed by law, but by the President in his character of Commander in Chief. The permit and coasting manifest granted by an officer thus appointed, and thus controlled by military authority, could not be recognized in any port of the United States, nor could they exempt the cargo from the payment of duties." (9 How., 616.)

Commenting generally upon this and other instances Chief Justice Taney made this decisive utterance: "The Treasury Department, in no instance that we are aware of since the establishment of the Government, has ever recognized a place in a newly acquired country as a domestic port, unless it had been previously made so by act of Congress. The principle thus adopted and acted upon by the executive department of the Government has been sanctioned by the decisions in this court and the circuit courts whenever the question came before them. And all of them maintain that under our revenue laws every port is regarded as a foreign one unless the custom-house from which the vessel clears is within a collection district established by act of Congress, and the officers granting the clearance exercise their functions under the authority of the laws of the United States." (9 How., 617.)

A separate tariff may be provided for the new territory by the simple means of continuing the present military governments. Their ports may thus remain foreign for tariff purposes (9 How., 615); they may levy a tariff on imports from us, and their goods continue to be subject to our import duties. As the Supreme Court specifically decided relative to the provisional governments of the South, such governments can "prescribe the revenues to be paid and apply them to their own use or otherwise." (20 Wall., 390.) And these governments, as we have seen, may continue indefinitely, and be terminated only in Congressional discretion. (16 How., 164.)

NO FREE TRADE.

New territory, therefore, may be acquired without becoming subject to the tariff provisions of our Constitution and laws. Sugar from Cuba and Hawaii, tobacco from Cuba and Porto Rico, and the products of the Philippines and Ladrones will not be admitted duty free, unless Congress so determines. Hence the vast sums invested in our sugar and tobacco industries need not be imperiled, nor need colonial imports reduce our customs revenues or disturb our economic status.

THE OPEN DOOR.

Sixth. The commerce of our Territories with foreign States involves the international trade problem of the "open door." The President's recent proclamation to the Filipinos has been misunderstood. "All ports," he says, "will be open to the commerce of all friendly nations. All goods * * * will be admitted upon payment of such duties and other charges as shall be in force at the time of the importation." If no duties are in force, none will be exacted. If Dingley tariff duties or any other exist, they must be paid. This is no "open door," nor even free trade. It is, moreover, only a military order, and may at any time be rescinded by the President. But when Congress makes "rules and regulations" for the new Territory, what then? If it should extend our Constitution and laws over the islands, free trade would then, as now, prevail within all our borders, and theoretically the Dingley tariff between us and the rest of the world.

The uniform tariff clause of the Constitution being operative, Congress would have no more authority to admit English goods free at Manila than at New York or Philadelphia. It must not be forgotten, however, that such action, while conclusive within our boundaries, is not final in our international relations. The President and Senate have, under the Constitution, unlimited power to make trade treaties. If we are not prepared to adopt free trade in its entirety, we must continue in the future, as in the past, to regulate our open doors by treaty and not by statute. As matter of fact, there has been no uniformity of tariff with foreign nations since our Government began. The "favored-nation" clause has not prevented such treaties, for nations have uniformly ignored it in their trade wars.

A trade war now exists between the United States and every European nation in the Orient except England. If England permits us to trade in China and India, our treaty-making power has authority to permit England to trade in the Philippines; if other European powers exclude us from their Asiatic ports, our treaty-making power, by refusing discriminating tariffs, can practically exclude them from the Philippines. There is no constitutional objection to giving Spain the preferential duties provided in Article IV of the pending treaty; and, if policy dictates, the President and Senate can extend similar discriminations to our trade allies, and refuse them to nations waging a tariff war against us.

EXPANSION DUE TO THE PRESS.

During the last year the American people have resolved upon a most momentous policy—to expand their continental bounds, acquire foreign territory, and take their place among nations as a dominant world power. Expansion is no longer a theory, but a fact. To the press of this country more than to any other aggregate intellectual force must be ascribed the development of this national policy, and for services thus rendered no tribute of praise can be unmerited.

The pending treaty will soon be ratified, and in practically its present form. As Senator GRAY tersely remarked, "it will merely put us in control of the situation." Then will confront Congress the gravest problems of the century. We have never legislated for barbarians in the Orient, nor enacted municipal laws for Malays, nor adjusted our institutions to Asiatic civilization. Old principles must be applied to new conditions. Congress shares the general confusion of public thought, distrusts its own prerogatives, and while possessing absolute power, yet daily discusses its limitations under the Constitution and Federal statutes.

DUTY OF THE AMERICAN BAR.

Now arises the opportunity of the American bar. Now is its time for action. It should emulate the patriotic services of the press; its counsel is imperatively needed; its advice will supremely benefit the nation.

What more vital issues can engage the attention of this association? What discussions can be more in harmony with its spirit and traditions? In all crises of our history the bar of New York, by profound learning, strength of argument, and splendor of eloquence, has beneficently influenced the destiny of the nation. Let us not now stand quiescent. Let us perform our full duty, and as "counsel learned in the law" advise the people and their representatives to a wise and just solution of these momentous problems.

Mr. HAY. I yield so much time as he may desire to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. JETT].

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to be permitted to add to my speech—as an appendix—a portion of certain citations from the authorities to which I have referred, on the question of international law as involved in this proposition.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks that under the leave already granted by the House unanimous consent would not be necessary.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I only wanted to be certain on that point.

Mr. JETT. Mr. Chairman, this is the second time during my service in the House of Representatives that a bill for the reorganization of the Army has been up for consideration in this body. I remember very distinctly the discussion that was aroused over this matter during the last session of Congress when it was up for consideration by the House. I had my convictions then with reference to the question as to whether or not the standing army of my country should be or should not be increased, and I maintain the same convictions on this great and important question at the present time—the same convictions that I maintained when the matter was before us on the occasion to which I have referred.

I regarded it, Mr. Chairman, then, as now, that character of question that should be discussed by the representatives of the American people with calmness, deliberation, and sincerity, by first laying aside all political prejudice or bias which we might entertain.

But let me say, as an humble representative of the people upon this floor, that I am sorry to see that some members have seen fit to inject into this discussion their political feeling and political prejudices when so important a question is under consideration. I regret it much, because I believe this is a question that should be considered by the people's representatives, regardless of their political affiliations or opinions now or heretofore entertained.

I am surprised to hear, within the short period of time that has elapsed since this question was then considered—I mean that time which has elapsed since we discussed this question last spring—that some of the gentlemen have so completely changed their positions upon the question presented by this bill.

I remember that my good friend and colleague from the great State of Illinois took a position in regard to the bill then under discussion, and in the debate during the time we had it under consideration stated fully his convictions before the House. He expressed at that time precisely the sentiments that I now hold and that I then held—the sentiments that I have maintained without change up to the present hour. But for some cause or other my colleague has seen fit to absolutely change his position and reverse the views he then entertained. He was in the frame of mind then of being willing that we should always rely in case of emergency upon our citizen soldiery. But to-day he is supporting a measure demanding the organization of an army of more than 100,000 enlisted men and officers—a regular army.

How he can reconcile his present opinion with that he entertained a few months ago I am unable to say, and I simply want to read in this connection a few words in which he set forth the views he then held, not by way of any reflection upon him whatever, but because of the fact that they announce perhaps more clearly and fully than I could do myself my views on the present question.

During the time that this measure was up for discussion on the 6th day of April, 1898, my colleague from Illinois [Mr. MARSH] used this language, as it appears in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD:

> Now, in the first place, I am opposed to the increase of the Regular Army to any such extent. The policy of European governments is to maintain large standing regular armies. Just the opposite has been the policy of this Republic from the earliest days down to the present time. In all of our wars, foreign and internecine, we have depended upon the citizen soldiery of the country to defend the flag. And, Mr. Speaker, the country has never depended upon them in vain. They have performed fully and completely all the functions of good soldiers. And I am opposed, even in time of war, to the considerable increase here proposed of the regular troops. In case of war, the imminent possibility of which now confronts us, I think it wise to do in the future as we have done in the past—to depend upon the citizen soldiery of the country.

Mr. Chairman, I have read these lines because, as I have already stated, they announce my convictions clearly on the matter that is before the House for consideration. What has caused this change in the opinion of my friend and colleague since that time? He thought it a wise thing and a good thing to do at that time. I think it is a wise thing and a good thing to do now. We have never had occasion to regret in the past our dependence upon the citizen soldiery of the country. And if we may judge the future by the past, we can confidently rest our faith in the perpetuity of the Government in the future upon the volunteer soldiers of the country. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. MARSH. Will the gentleman allow me?

Mr. JETT. To be sure; I always would do a thing of that kind for my friend.

Mr. MARSH. Does my colleague believe that the volunteer soldiery of the country desire to perform garrison duty and police duty in the Philippine Islands, in Cuba, and in Porto Rico?

Mr. JETT. I will answer that by saying no; because the purposes for which the volunteer soldiers were enlisted who are now serving have been accomplished. Their duty has been discharged. They have complied with the terms of their contract.

I will say, however, further, that I do not believe there is any necessity at this time for a standing army of 100,000 men, as is proposed by this bill. I believe the substitute offered here, upon which I hope we shall have an opportunity to vote, more thoroughly carries out what I believe to be just and right and proper for us to enact at this time. As there is no necessity for a large increase in the standing army, this substitute provides for a standing army of 30,000 men, and it further provides that if there is any necessity for it, if the President in his discretion believes that there is any necessity, he can call and raise a volunteer army for the purposes set forth in the substitute, and those who would volunteer under the provisions of this substitute would know for what purpose they were volunteering, and the men who volunteered and entered upon this war in which we were so successful, who did not enter the service to do garrison duty, could be discharged. They have discharged their duty according to the terms of the contract as they understood it.

And now, if we should adopt this substitute, then I say that those who enlisted under it would understand clearly and thoroughly the purpose for which they entered the service of the United States, and I believe that we would not have the difficulty and complaint which arises at this time from those who are doing garrison duty from the volunteer soldiery. [Applause.]

And now, Mr. Chairman, the bill under consideration is one the provisions of which are for the reorganizing of the Army of the United States, and at the same time increase the Army to more than 100,000 enlisted men and officers. It is a measure that is of as much consequence to the American people, in my judgment, as any that has been considered by the Congress within the last quarter of a century.

It is important to the people because of the fact that it is a departure from the old established policy of our Government, as well as of the fact that, if it becomes a law, it will add heavy burdens upon an already overburdened people. I have at all times been opposed to a strong standing army, and am still of the same opinion on this question that I have maintained for years, and at this time I am unable to see any necessity for an army of the proportions called for in this bill known as the Hull bill. I believe that a strong standing army as provided in and by this bill is one that is antagonistic to the principles of a republican form of government, and that it would prove detrimental to the institutions of our country.

I can not by any process of reasoning arrive at the conclusion that a strong standing army goes hand in hand with a republican form of government. The fathers never contemplated such when they outlined and drafted the fundamental law of the land, because, as I believe, it was never expected that in a government such as they were then organizing, and which put the power into the hands of the people, such an emergency would ever arise that would require the sustaining of a strong standing army, or that such a policy as is now called for by the author of this bill could be sustained and the rights and interests of the people remain inviolate upon a theory of a government by the people.

I believe that a standing army as large as asked for at this time would prove a menace to the people. We know from the past history of other countries what effect a strong army has had, and what influence it has wielded at the expense of the great mass of the people, and that it has had the effect of overthrowing governments. If we are to judge the future by the past, and knowing the effect that strong armies have had toward the downfall of governments, we should, as representatives of the American people, representing their interests in the American Congress, take into consideration those things, and not favor a policy and the enactment of a law that has led toward the downfall of governments and destroyed prosperous and happy people.

We have for more than a quarter of a century maintained in this Government a standing army of less than one-fourth of the size of the Army that is now asked for. With a population of over 75,000,000 people, we have maintained an army for years of but 25,000, and up until recently there has been no great demand from any source for an increase of our Army. For years prior to the breaking out of the Spanish-American war, in my judgment this House would not have for a moment considered a bill the purpose of which was the increasing of the Army. If an increased army is required or needed, it is because of the fact of our new possessions. As we have had an army heretofore sufficient to meet all reqirements at home, the increase demanded should not exceed more than will be required to maintain peace and order in our newly-acquired territory and in the island of Cuba.

Mr. Chairman, there appears to be a difference of opinion, even among those who are in favor of and are advocating the passage of a measure of this kind, as to the number of troops that will be required in the different islands. The Adjutant-General is of the opinion that 50,000 soldiers are required in Cuba to maintain peace and order. This is, in my judgment, an extravagant estimate. Whilst this number is demanded for Cuba, yet no good reason is shown why so many troops should be sent there. The fact is, as was developed before the Committee on Military Affairs, that before the insurrection was on in Cuba the Spanish Government only kept 12,000 soldiers in the island. The Cuban people were unfriendly to the Spaniards, yet it seems that 12,000 soldiers held them in subjection. If such was the case, when the Spaniards are removed why should it be necessary to have a force of 50,000 upon the island? If the old Cuban patriot, General Garcia, who but recently departed this life in this city, has been reported correctly, then there is no necessity for 50,000 troops. General Garcia is reported as having said that 8,000 troops would be sufficient to garrison the island, and he declared that "the American flag alone, after the departure of the Spaniards, would preserve order."

General Wood, military commander of Santiago, is still claiming that we should have 50,000 troops in Cuba. While I do not agree with him, yet it seems to me that if his judgment is correct, as those favoring the bill will probably say it is, or accept it, then it seems that the gentlemen who are strong expansionists would learn an important lesson from the experience or judgment of General Wood, and that is, if it takes 50,000 soldiers to maintain peace and order in Cuba, with a million population, at that ratio it would take an army of 500,000 to maintain peace and order in the Philippines, and cost five hundred millions annually.

As to the Philippines, it appears to me at this time we are not in a position to legislate with reference to the size of the Army or the number of troops that should be provided to maintain peace and order in those islands, and simply because they are now sending troops to the Philippines is no good reason why the Army should be increased as is provided in and by this measure.

While the question of the disposition of these islands is still an open one, if it is necessary to have an increase at all I believe the substitute which has been read and will be offered at the proper time more clearly meets the demands according to the situation at the present as I understand it. The substitute provides for an army of 30,000, the same as under existing law, and the President of the United States, at his discretion, may issue his proclamation for not more than 50,000 men, whose services are deemed necessary by reason of the relation of the Government of the United States to the islands of Porto Rico, Cuba, Philippines, Hawaii, and the Ladrone Islands.

It provides further that the same organization shall apply to this body of troops as applies to the Regular Army of the United States, and that they shall be officered by officers appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate; and it provides further that these volunteers herein provided for shall be organized into such classes of troops as the President in his discretion shall deem best.

Mr. Chairman, the substitute further provides that this Volunteer Army shall, as far as practicable, be taken from the several States and Territories and the District of Columbia, and that they shall be mustered out of the service of the United States two years from the date of the passage of this act, unless their time of service is sooner terminated.

It will therefore be seen that by the provisions of the substitute a sufficient force is provided for the coast and interior defenses of the United States; and if we are to continue to send troops to the Philippines and garrison Porto Rico and Cuba, liberal provisions are made in the substitute by which the President can call into the service an army for their use in these places. Why, then, place on the Federal statutes of this country a law providing for a standing army of more than 100,000, and put the people of this nation to the enormous expense that would necessarily be required to sustain such an army? I am not only opposed to this on account of the enormous expense that it would put our people to, but I am opposed to it also as a matter of principle.

It is antagonistic to the teachings of a democratic government, and if the policy sought to be thrust upon the American people by the supporters and adherents of the bill reported by the majority of the Committee on Military Affairs of this House is successful, the effect of it will be to build up an aristocracy in the Army. I will not lend my vote to a measure the effect of which will be to build up an aristocracy in the Army or in any other branch of the Government. I am not one of those who believe that the proud American Republic, after more than a hundred years of its independence, should now embark upon a policy that would ultimately lead to the dictation of the policy in this country by the military arm of the Government. I need only to cite you to the so-called republican form of government in France, where the army dictates and absolutely controls the policy of that nation. We see how unsettled it is at this time, and we know how it has been for years, all of which is the result of the strong army that it maintains and by reason of which it has built up an aristocracy in that country in the army.

Mr. Chairman, I will not detain the House for any considerable length of time. I know that there are many members here who desire to speak; but there is one question to which I desire to call the attention of the House, and that is the question of expense. I desire to call the attention of the House to the enormous expense of maintaining an army of the size provided for by this bill.

I know there has been a difference of opinion on this question in the minds of members in this House. I have heard the testimony of the Adjutant-General; I have seen his estimates; and yet I will say frankly that I am at a loss to know or to estimate anywhere in the neighborhood of the annual cost. I see in the report made by the Adjutant-General to the committee he says it would cost annually $82,053,655.56 to maintain the army provided by the present bill. That is his statement in his report.

I remember very distinctly when the Adjutant-General of the Army was before the Committee on Military Affairs, when he was being heard, the question was put to him as to what would probably be the expense of maintaining this army, and to show to the House that there is not only a difference of opinion in the minds of members of this body as to the cost of maintaining this army provided for by the Hull bill, but in the mind of the Adjutant-General himself, I call attention to the discrepancy between the statement in his report and his statement when orally examined before the committee. In his report he says, on page 16, that the cost will be $82,053,665 annually, but here is what the Adjutant-General said when he was before the Committee on Military Affairs. The question was asked by my colleague on the committee [Mr. SULZER]:

What would the annual cost be to the people of this country for an army of 100,000 strong, such as is contemplated by this bill which has been introduced by Mr. HULL?

General CORBIN. I could not answer that question unless I had a pencil and paper. I could send you that from the office. There are so many elements that enter into it that I could not answer right off.

Mr. SULZER. I wish you would send to the committee a statement as to the cost of the present Regular Army, and what the cost would be to maintain the Regular Army according to the provisions of Mr. HULL's bill, including the cost of transportation.

General CORBIN. It is a pretty safe rule to follow that the pay for the subsistence, the clothing, the transportation, the arms, the ammunition, and all that relating to the soldier, in rough figures will amount up to $1,000 per capita; not much less and not much more. One thousand dollars per capita for every man in the Army is a fair average. If you have 100,000 men, you can just put it down at $100,000,000.

There is the testimony of the Adjutant-General as to the probable cost of sustaining an army of 100,000 men as provided in this bill. Yet he has submitted another estimate, in which he says it would cost only about $82,000,000.

Then he goes on to say:

If you will run through the appropriations made by Congress for the Army during the war, before the war, and during all the years, you will find that the appropriations have been about on a basis of $1,000 per annum per man.

I do not, Mr. Chairman, intend any reflection upon the Adjutant-General, but merely to show that, apparently, no one is hardly able to estimate this great cost that would have to be met.

This, of course, contemplates the cost of maintaining the Army when the Army is kept at home; but if they are to be sent abroad, then the estimates will be more than they have been reported by the War Department thus far. So, then, I say, Mr. Chairman, that this is an important element that should receive the consideration of this House. I believe that I am as patriotic as my brother member who holds a seat on the other side of this Chamber, but I am not in favor at this time of thrusting upon the people of my country such an enormous tax as this would bring. While I have the honor to represent one of the most important districts of this country, a proud and patriotic constituency, I do not believe that they are in favor of a standing army of 100,000 men and the necessary expense that would follow. It is their interests that I am trying to represent here.

The question now is, Mr. Chairman, who is it that is demanding a strong standing army for this country? From what source is the call made? Is this coming from the great mass of the people, who are the wealth producers? Is this demand coming from the laboring classes, those who are depending on their toil for the support of themselves and their families? I answer in the negative. Those engaged in agriculture and those who gain a livelihood by manual labor are not demanding an army of the proportions provided for in this bill.

There are no more patriotic people than the wage-earner and the farmer. They are always willing to respond to the call of their country, and have heretofore, at all times when the interests of their country were at stake, volunteered their services and gone forth and fought and won the great battles of the nation. They stand willing at all times to go forth and do battle for their country's sake, but in my judgment they are not demanding a strong standing body of troops in a time of profound peace, who are to be kept and maintained at the expense of the taxpayers.

Again, if the President desires a strong army he ought to say to Congress for what purpose the army is needed. No showing has been made to Congress that there is any necessity for such an array of troops to be organized into regulars as is asked for here and at this time.

Now, in conclusion, Mr. Chairman, I desire to say a few words with reference to the Philippines.

I am willing to put the Philippines upon the same basis and give to them the same right as the American Congress agreed to give and to do by Cuba. I am unable to see any reason why we should not treat with the Philippines as we agreed to do, as is evidenced by the resolutions passed by Congress last spring, with the Cubans. If we were right in principle when we resolved to give to the people of Cuba a stable government, why is it not right at this time to make the same advances toward the people of the Philippines? I am for my country and my country's welfare at all times, but I am opposed to oppression and the instruments of oppression. [Applause.]

Mr. HAY. Mr. Chairman, I yield twenty minutes to the gentleman from Arkansas.

Mr. McRAE. Now, Mr. Chairman——

Mr. HULL. Before the gentleman proceeds, will he allow me to yield twenty minutes to the gentleman from Ohio? Gentlemen on that side are much ahead of us now, and we have not much longer time for general debate.

Mr. McRAE. I hope that will not interfere with the arrangement already made. I am needed in the committee room, and the delay will only be twenty minutes.

Mr. HULL. We have but little over two hours of our time remaining and gentlemen on that side have less than an hour, and I simply ask to use a part of that time now.

Mr. McRAE. I can not consent to yield the floor since I have been recognized.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Arkansas is recognized.

[Mr. McRAE addressed the committee. See Appendix.]

Mr. HULL. I yield twenty minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BROMWELL].

NECESSITY OF A LARGER ARMY.

Mr. BROMWELL. Mr. Chairman, the general provisions of this bill I am heartily in favor of. About some special items I shall perhaps offer some suggestions when we come to consider the bill under the five-minute rule. Therefore I shall not now comment upon the bill except in a general way.

It seems to me, Mr. Chairman, that this is a bill about which there ought not to be any division along party lines, because I am willing to concede to gentlemen on the other side of the House the same desire to uphold American honor, to protect American interests, and to preserve the internal peace of the country that we on the Republican side claim for ourselves.

This is a bill for the reorganization and increase of the Army. It is a bill which is recognized as necessary by every military expert in the country. It is rendered necessary not only by the experiences of the late war and the mistakes that were made therein, but it is rendered equally necessary by the rapidly increasing population of this country and the increase in the interests which the Army is called upon to protect. It is necessary in case of war or to maintain our possessions recently acquired; and it is equally necessary if we are to surrender every inch of new ground upon which the foot of an American soldier has trodden within the last year.

We have learned a lesson in regard to our Navy. Fortunately, we commenced the upbuilding and rebuilding of our Navy many years ago; and we can not but congratulate ourselves that we did take in hand this great work of rebuilding this bulwark of our national defense in time of peace, so that we might be prepared for the emergency of war. It is our duty to-day to do for the Army what we did years ago for the Navy—to start its reorganization and to increase it to sufficient strength to meet all the demands that may be made upon it. We have rested content for thirty years with this obsolete organization which is now in force. The world in the meantime has been moving on; other nations have studied the art of war and have made improvements of which we have not yet taken advantage.

In this bill, in its general features, it is proposed to profit by that experience and put the American Army on the same footing of efficiency as the armies of the military nations of the world.

OBJECTIONS URGED.

The objections which have been made to the increase of the Army are based upon the following considerations: First, that there is no necessity for it at this time; second, that it will cost a large sum of money and increase the burdens upon the people to such an extent as ought not to be borne; and third, that it is a menace to the liberties of the people of America.

It has been well said and is practically admitted by everyone that if we are to hold the Philippine Islands, Cuba, and Porto Rico, even for a limited time, these islands must be policed by the regulars of the United States Army for the purpose of maintaining order and government until the political disposition of the islands shall be determined upon by the Government. The expense which gentlemen have alleged was to be such a grievous burden upon the people of America may be, let me say, but a trifle as compared with the expense in men and in money which may come to us if we do not, in time of peace, when we can deliberately prepare an army for future emergencies, take such steps as will make it a satisfactory and efficient organization.

THE ARMY WILL BE NO MENACE.

The fear that the American Army will be a menace to the liberties of our own people is almost too ridiculous, Mr. Chairman, to combat.

The American Army—of what is it made? It is composed of our own people, officered by our own sons and our own brothers, our neighbors and their sons, composed of the young men we have year after year sent to our Military Academy to receive the necessary training to fit them for the duties imposed upon them—men who in an emergency can be relied upon, who know what the demands of the hour are upon them as citizens of the United States, and educated not only in military science at the expense of the Government, but, better than all of that, educated in the love of country and their duty to their fellow-citizens and to themselves. Shall we look to these young men who have gone into the Army of the United States to become traitors to their country, even while they bare their heads to their country's flag, as they do every time that they pass by it?

Is it possible that sensible men can entertain such an opinion as that? They are not Hessians; they are not slaves, purchased soul and body for military purpose. They are American citizens, as we are. They have the love of country implanted in them as firmly as we have. They have their devotion to the flag of their country as thoroughly grounded as you or I. And the rank and file of the Army are also Americans. They are men taken from the walks of private life, from the farms, from the workshops, and from the great masses of the people. Can it be asserted that they will betray their country because for the time being they are enlisted in the Regular Army of the United States? It is impossible, Mr. Chairman, to believe such a suggestion. Fearless in the defense of their country's honor, they would be equally fearless in refusing to partake in the destruction of its liberties.

What could such a diminutive number do with the ten or twelve millions of men capable of bearing arms in this country? What an insult to the patriotism and courage of the American people to say that the little, insignificant Regular Army of 50,000 or 100,000 men can crush out the liberty of a great republic!

COMPARISON WITH ARMIES OF OTHER COUNTRIES.

Compare the Regular Army of our country with those of other nations on a peace footing. The regular army of Russia is 860,000 men; France, 615,413 men; of the German Empire, 585,440 men; of Austria-Hungary, 385,697 men; of Italy, 231,355, and of Great Britain, 163,569. Compare these with the Army of the United States—only about 25,000 men.

These numbers, too, let me state, are exclusive of the native colonial troops. Assuming that the population of the United States is 70,000,000, that would make one regular soldier for about 2,800 inhabitants. Then compare that with the number which exists for one regular soldier and is protected by that soldier in each of the other countries of the world. In France they have 63 citizens to 1 soldier; in Germany, 1 soldier for every 80 inhabitants; in Austria-Hungary, 1 for every 115; in Italy, 1 for every 135; in Russia, 1 for every 150; in Great Britain, 1 for every 233 inhabitants, while in the United States the regular soldier stands in front of and protects 2,800 men, women, and children, and protects them against everything, not only from domestic troubles but foreign invasion and on every occasion.

Mr. HENRY of Mississippi. Are we threatened?

Mr. BROMWELL. We are threatened every day of the existence of the country, and we must prepare ourselves at all times to meet emergencies which may arise.

LABORING MEN DO NOT FEAR OUR ARMY.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I know gentlemen say that when we increase this standing army it is going to be for the purpose of permitting corporations and trusts to use this army to crush out the life of labor and to interfere with the individual liberty of the citizen.

This statement is an insult to the patriotism and the love of order of the American workingman. Who is it that fears the American Army? Not the American laborer, either organized or unorganized: not the man who desires to obey the laws of the country; not the man who is interested, perhaps more than any other class of men, in being protected in his labor that he may by that labor earn the bread with which he feeds his wife and children. It is the disorderly; it is those who are not law-abiding. It is the great undercurrent of the vile life which drifts into our great cities that finds fault with the standing Army of the United States, with the sheriff and the posse comitatus of our county and State, and with the police force of our cities. They, and not the honest, law-abiding laborer, would be glad to have unlimited license to interfere with human liberty and with private and public property.

Two years ago, in the platform of one of the great parties of this country, it was proposed to break down the barriers which protect society. What answer did the workingmen of the country make to that? Did they blindly follow this doctrine of anarchy? Did they decide that the Supreme Court of the United States should be shackled? Did they decide that the Executive of this great nation should not be given the power to protect its interests? On the contrary, in every street, in every great city of the country, thousands upon thousands of these laboring men marched in their clubs and organizations, from their factories and workshops, to show that they were in favor of a stable, capable, and safe government of their liberties.

Mr. LEWIS of Washington. Will the gentleman allow me?

Mr. BROMWELL. Excuse me.

VOLUNTEERS CAN NOT TAKE THE PLACE OF REGULARS.

Gentlemen who are opposed to this increase will say, "Why not depend upon the spontaneous enthusiasm of American patriotism to furnish an army of volunteers for emergencies as they arise?" Gentlemen, volunteers are not regulars. Patriotic devotion can not take the place of discipline. Enthusiasm is but a poor substitute for trained knowledge. Heroism and personal devotion can accomplish little compared with the results obtained by years of physical training for the fatigues and hardships of the soldier's life.

I would not detract in the slightest from the magnificent work which has been done by the American volunteer in this and in every war in which he has been engaged. He has made a record of which the nation may well be proud and will do so again whenever it becomes necessary to call him into action. But we must not forget that the science of military affairs, like that of naval warfare, is advancing with rapid strides. Methods and implements of war which were successful thirty years ago have, like the wooden ships of the old Navy, become useless in the light of progress. Even as the United States has profited by the experience of other nations in rebuilding her Navy, has avoided their mistakes and adopted their successes, so she should to-day be willing, in the reorganization of her Army, to profit by the experience of other warlike powers.

It is true that our conditions are far more fortunate than theirs in that we are not in close touch with jealous nations, ready at all times and upon slight pretext to take offense and commit aggression. But, on the other hand, we must not forget that we no longer occupy the position of isolation in the world that we had in the days of our fathers. We can not forget, either, that our country is growing enormously in its population, both by natural increase and by foreign immigration, and that this growth is largely being concentrated in the great cities of the country, from which, as centers, the arteries of commerce, transportation, and finance reach out to every part of our system.

We can not forget how utterly dependent, by reason of this interconnection of interests, vast sections of country become upon these centers. Paralyze the nerve center, and prostration results; give mob rule control of a great city, stopping transportation and traffic, stopping the transmission of intelligence through the mails, and the result is not confined to the one locality in which the disturbance occurs, but affects the nation at large.

A city would be looked upon with contempt whose police force could not be sufficient to maintain order and protect life and property. A State would be worthy of no respect if its laws could be overridden and put to defiance by a reckless mob. This great Government owes it to every citizen that so far as the great interests which are placed by the Constitution in its care and keeping—the protection of public property, the preservation of public order when called upon by the executive of a State, and the free and uninterrupted conduct of interstate commerce—it shall have an ample force of trained regular soldiers at its disposal and for discharging these duties.

The day may come when not only nations will lay down their arms, but the entire citizenship of this country shall become so law-abiding that police supervision shall become unnecessary, but that day marks the beginning of the millennium and is not yet upon us. We must legislate for conditions as they are, we must still continue in force our statutes for the prevention and punishment of crime, we must give to the strong executive arm of the Government the means to enforce the Constitution and laws, which the President and every officer of the United States is sworn to support and maintain. It is the judgment of those best informed that even on a peace basis and for these purposes the Army should be largely increased.

We are in possession of islands which have come to us as the fruits of war. These islands are now occupied by American soldiers, most of whom must be discharged at the conclusion of the treaty of peace. The passage of this bill becomes a necessity for supplying men to take their places if we are to continue the occupancy of these territories. It is apparent that the principal opposition to this bill grows out of and is coincident with the feeling that these possessions should not be permanently retained and controlled by the United States. The objections which are made are of two general classes:

OBJECTIONS TO EXPANSION.

First. That it is unconstitutional to acquire, retain, and govern them.

Second. That admitting the constitutional right to do so, it is unwise as a question of national policy.

The first contention, viz, that it is unconstitutional to acquire, retain, and govern this territory has been made the subject of deep and exhaustive research by some of the ablest men in the country, and notably of distinguished gentlemen in the Senate.

I wish to call the attention of the members of the House who have not seen it to an address made by Mr. Gardner, of New York, published in the New York Tribune of the 19th instant. It is the most convincing and logical argument in favor of the constitutionality of the right to take, maintain, and govern these territories that I have yet seen. Briefly, the points made in that admirable address are as follows:

LEGAL RIGHT TO ACQUIRE, HOLD, AND GOVERN TERRITORY.

First. That the United States, when the colonies became free and independent, became invested with all the rights of a sovereign nation, with rights equal to those of every nation on earth, not hampered or controlled by any constitution, so far as those rights of sovereignty are concerned; not hampered or controlled by any legislation which had taken place under the Constitution, but free and independent, with the inherent right to declare war, to make peace, to acquire territory, to cede territory, to do all else that independent nations might do.

Second. This right of sovereignty preceded and is independent of the Constitution and the Federal Statutes. It is lodged in the people of the country, all the people as a unit, without reference to the form of government.

Third. That among these sovereign rights is that of acquiring territory, either by purchase, cession, voluntary annexation, or by conquest and resulting treaty. This right has been exercised in each of the above forms in the acquisition of territory we already possess. This right to acquire territory has been sustained by a long line of decisions. Among others, see 1 Pet., 542; Story on Constitution, section 1287; 136 U. S., 42; 19 Howard, 447.

Fourth. The right to acquire gives the right to hold and govern. This principle is stated concisely by Justice Bradley, as follows:

It would be absurd to hold that the United States has power to acquire territory and no power to govern it when acquired.

See also 136 U. S., 42–44; Story on Constitution, 1324; 6 Cranch, 336; 1 Pet., 542; 114 U. S., 44; 152 U. S., 48.

Fifth. The question of annexation of territory is a question for the executive and legislative branches of the Government, with which the courts have no concern.

The President and Congress are vested with all the responsibility and powers of the Government for the maintenance and extension of our national dominion. It is not the province of the courts to participate in the discussion or decision of these questions, for they are of a political nature and not judicial. Congress and the President having assumed jurisdiction and sovereignty * * * all the people and courts of the country are bound by such governmental acts.

See also 50 Fed. Rep., 110; 14 Pet., 538; 9 How., 242; 18 Wall., 320; 101 U. S., 133.

Sixth. Having power to acquire and to hold and govern, the next question which seems to have been fully settled is that the form of government rests entirely with the Congress of the United States and that the Constitution and laws enacted previous to the territorial acquisition do not of themselves become operative in the new territory, but require special legislative action to extend them over such territory.

The Constitution of the United States, Article IV, section 3, clause 2, reads:

The Congress shall have power to dispose of and make all needful rules and regulations respecting the territory or other property belonging to the United States, etc.

That the government of the Territories belongs solely and exclusively to Congress independent of any constitutional provisions or general legislation affecting the States has been repeatedly affirmed by the Supreme Court.

See 18 Wall., 319; 9 How., 242; 101 U. S., 132; 114 U. S., 44; 139 U. S., 446; 14 Pet., 537; 136 U. S., 42.

That special action has always been deemed necessary in order to extend these constitutional provisions and general laws to newly acquired territory has been conclusively shown by the citations of the various laws printed in the RECORD, pages 1070 and 1071 of this session.

This disposes of the contention that when the treaty of peace is signed the inhabitants of all these islands shall under the Constitution ex proprio vigore become citizens of the United States with the rights of all other citizens under the Constitution.

WHAT IS THE POLICY OF THE PRESIDENT.

The Constitution of the United States, Article IV, section 3, just cited, answers the question that has been so persistently put to the President of the United States by gentlemen on this floor, "What is your policy?" The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR] has answered that question fully and satisfactorily.

The President has no policy until this Congress acts. The Constitution of the United States does not give him authority to dispose of and make rules and regulations for the government of the Territories; but it gives to this House and to the Senate, with the approval of the President, the power to make these rules and to dispose of these territories. The only authority that he will have will be, when these two Houses of Congress shall have sent to him a bill expressing their wishes and their policy, to attach his signature in approval or disapproval. If it meets his disapproval, then the President of the United States in his message to Congress can announce his views as to our policy, not his.

VARIOUS FORMS OF TERRITORIAL GOVERNMENT.

That no uniform system of government is demanded of Congress is illustrated by the various Territories over which our jurisdiction extends at the present time, independent of our recently acquired territory. Thus we have in the District of Columbia one class of laws. In Arizona and New Mexico, to which will shortly be added Hawaii and Alaska, other forms of government as organized Territories, but differing widely in details among themselves. In the Indian Territory we have no Territorial organization, but administer the government directly from Washington. In Samoa we govern jointly with two other nations in the form of a protectorate and under treaty stipulations. Any of these various forms will be changed at the discretion of Congress.

Upon the signing of the treaty of peace Porto Rico and the Philippines will come to us as unorganized territories, for the reason that there is no stipulation in the treaty which requires an immediate extension of the constitutional provisions or general laws over their inhabitants. We can extend these provisions if we choose to do so, or we can refrain from so doing if we choose; and until some action is taken by us the Executive has authority under the precedents already established to maintain a military government.

That was the case, notably with Florida, between the time of our taking possession and the enactment of laws for its government by Congress.

Article IX of the pending treaty with Spain is in the following language:

> The civil rights and political status of the native inhabitants of the territory hereby ceded to the United States shall be determined by the Congress.

Seventh. As a corollary to the above proposition these territories may be given a system of taxation, both local and by way of customs impositions, different from those imposed upon the States, for taxation is but one of the forms of legislation growing out of sovereignty and coming within the power of Congress to make all rules and regulations for the Territories. It need not be upon the basis of representation, as Chief Justice Marshall stated very clearly in the following language:

> If it were true that according to the spirit of our Constitution the power of taxation must be limited by the right of representation, whence is derived the power to lay and collect duties, imposts, and excises? (5 Wheat., 325)

The treaty of peace containing no provision concerning taxation, it follows that until Congress extends the constitutional provisions, Article I, section 8, requiring all duties, imposts, and excises to be uniform throughout the United States, that the matter of uniformity or nonuniformity is entirely within the control of the Congress itself.

Eighth. The accession of this territory does not extend the right of citizenship to the inhabitants of these islands, nor is the fourteenth amendment applicable to their condition, for the reason, above stated, that the Constitution does not either in its body or in any of its amendments become operative without express action.

Ninth. As a further corollary the entire subject of immigration into the United States from these islands is a matter within the control of Congress. It can extend the exclusion acts or it can modify or repeal them, as it sees proper. This disposes of the objection that upon the conclusion of the treaty of peace the Chinese and Malays or other objectionable elements of the population of those islands may come in vast numbers into this country to enter into competition with American labor.

So much for the legal aspect of the case. With absolute power in Congress to legislate for these territories, not only for their own best interests but for the best interests of our own country as well, I can foresee no great difficulty as to acquiring, retaining, governing, or disposing, in any way we see proper, of these possessions.

THE POLICY OF EXPANSION.

The other phase of the question as to the proper policy of the Government is another question, about which there may be legitimately a wide diversity of opinion. One fact we must, however, recognize at the very outset, and that is the fact that we are to-day in actual possession of this acquired territory and responsible in the eyes of the world for the preservation of order and the protection of life and property while that possession continues; and, being thus responsible, we should put ourselves in a position to discharge that duty effectually.

It can only be done at the present time by military occupancy, to preserve these islands either from the anarchy of misrule by native leaders or absorption by foreign powers. It has been well stated by distinguished gentlemen who have already spoken upon this subject that all the other alternatives, of returning these islands to Spain, of disposing of them to other foreign powers, or of withdrawing our protection from them, are so contrary to our own ideas of duty and so contrary to the expectation of the world and our own ideas of justice that we are remitted to the final alternative of continuing, for a time at least, our present status therein.

The gentlemen who are so persistent in catechising the members on this side of the House as to their views in regard to forcing, as they put it, the government established by the United States against the wishes of the inhabitants of the Philippine Islands will no doubt desire an expression of my views, if they consider them of any importance, upon the subject. While I believe the question is a mere hypothetical one, and is based upon no condition which now exists or which may hereafter arise, I shall not hesitate to answer it frankly and fully. I believe that candor is due not only to this House but to the country upon every great political question. When the question of the recognition of a supposed existing government in the island of Cuba at the declaration of war was before this House, I was one of a few Republicans who honestly and conscientiously, and upon information which we supposed at that time to be accurate and trustworthy, favored that proposition.

WHO HAVE A RIGHT TO SPEAK FOR THE PHILLIPINES.

Candor compels me to say that in the light of history and subsequent events I believe now a mistake would have been made in doing so. The situation in the Philippines is radically different from what I was led to believe was the case in Cuba. It is not claimed by even the most ardent supporters of the anti-annexation policy that there is to-day any form of government in those islands other than that maintained by the United States by reason of military occupation.

The claim that Aguinaldo and his half-savage followers represent either a present or possible stable and independent government, capable of maintaining peace, protecting life and property, or discharging the duties of international obligations, is not seriously believed or advocated by any gentlemen upon this floor or elsewhere. Were the question of submission to his rule passed upon by the civilized inhabitants it would be unanimously rejected. He has no more rights to consideration than the chief of an Indian tribe in the Louisiana Territory, who had been at war with France and Spain while this Territory was in their possession, to have set up the claim that the United States having acquired it by cession from its former owners should be compelled to recognize him and his savage followers as entitled to recognition and recession of the Territory.

Under a Democratic Administration Louisiana became ours by purchase; the Orleans Territory, which was carved out of it, was as alien to our people, our language, our laws, and our customs and traditions as are the Philippines to-day. Its people were as vigorous in their protest against annexation to the United States as could any inhabitant of Luzon be to-day. We forced our Government upon them without their consent; we maintained order by military force; we kept the people of the territory in a state of tutelage until the time came when we could admit them to the Union.

I am not now referring to the legal right to acquire this territory, nor to the fact that under the treaty with France by which Louisiana became a part of this country there was a specific provision for the extension of the Constitution and laws of the United States and its admission to the Union as soon as possible. That question I have considered settled by the citations heretofore made. But I am referring merely to the fact that we have historical precedent, and that, too, under the Administration of the father of the Democratic party, Thomas Jefferson, for forcing an unwilling people to accept our government.

Briefly, therefore, my position is this: We are in the Philippine Islands as guardians of peace and order until at least some form of self-government shall be established. Should Aguinaldo and his insurgent followers attempt by force to interfere with the discharge of this duty, I for one would be willing to use the Army and Navy of the United States to compel him by force to submit to our control just as I would require an Indian chief and his tribe to maintain order in any part of the territory we had previously acquired.

I for one do not propose to repeat with the Filipinos the mistake which might have been made had we recognized the reputed government of Cuba, which did not represent and could not represent the wishes of the inhabitants of that island. I, for one, believe that the present status should be maintained in the Philippines until we can study the conditions and means of its inhabitants, not of the savage, barbarous tribes which neither have nor are capable of having local government, but of those civilized portions of the islands which live in settled communities, enjoy the blessings of civilization, are capable of local self-government and possibly of national existence, and who desire a stable government, whether it be dependent upon the United States as a protectorate, as an integral part of our jurisdiction, or as an independent government.

WE SHALL ACT WHEN WE HAVE FULL KNOWLEDGE.

When this information shall have been had, we shall be ready to act and we shall act, I have no doubt, wisely for our own interests as well as justly for theirs. But until that decision is reached, Aguinaldo and every other agitator and disturber must be compelled to recognize the authority of our Government, and await the working out of the problem. If this means forcing upon an unwilling people a government of our own instead of theirs, I am in favor of it, but until we hear from the real parties in interest, who are entitled to have a voice in the decision of this question, I deny that any such question is more than a hypothetical and academic one.

It is also urged that in reaching out into this distant part of the world and planting our flag in another hemisphere we are forgetting the traditions of our fathers; forgetting the precepts of Washington, and acting in violation of the Monroe doctrine.

For a phrase that is so frequently used as the Monroe doctrine I know of nothing concerning which there is more universal mistake and misunderstanding. Time does not permit me to comment upon this phase of the subject in the presence of the House, but I shall take the liberty of inserting, under the permission given to extend our remarks, a few remarks upon the history and interpretation of this doctrine, and will endeavor to show its limited application, its true sphere, and that it in no wise hampers or controls our action in the present case.

THE FUTURE OF OUR COUNTRY.

In conclusion I wish to say that engrossed as we have been in the past with the settlement of our internal affairs, looking inwardly upon our domestic concerns rather than outwardly upon the world at large, we have suddenly, as a result of the Spanish war, awakened to a realization of the fact that the genius of our institutions will not permit us to slumber in the sleep of lethargy which dwarfed the advancement of China and Japan for so many centuries. We have climbed to higher altitudes, and above the mists and fogs which have obscured our vision in the past we look out upon a broadening horizon. We see and realize that in this busy, modern world, upon which the twentieth century will soon dawn, we must bear our share with the enlightened nations of the world in advancing the happiness and welfare of humanity.

With this brightened vision we see the commerce of the United States again reviving and its white sails fluttering on every ocean and its flag floating in every breeze. We see the products of American ingenuity, the rich harvests of American soil, and the treasures of her hills and mountains offered in every mart of the civilized world. We see American vessels, built by American skill, manned by American sailors, and laden with American merchandise, in every quarter of the globe. We see an American Navy, the equal of any in the world, with Deweys and Sampsons and Schleys and Wainwrights in command and American men behind the guns to protect our merchant marine. We see coaling stations and resting places for this vast fleet to enter and renew their energies and strength. We see a great canal across the Isthmus, built by American capital, controlled by American influence, and constructed for American commerce, across the narrow strip that connects our northern and our southern continents.

We see that as the old nation of eastern Asia or the new developments in Africa open up new markets and new fields of enterprise, the United States claims its full and fair share in the benefits of this onward march. We can not stand still; stagnation means retrogression, and that means ultimately political death. We must move upward and onward with the rest of the world; we are entitled to be in the van of the march. Wherever our flag shall be planted it shall bring to the people who rest beneath its shadow the blessings of liberty and equality and a better civilization. The Monroe doctrine shall no longer be limited to the claim of America for Americans, but shall be enlarged to mean, "All the world for American commerce, and the protection of the American flag over the lives of American citizens and American property in every corner of the earth;", and as one by one the countries of the earth yield to the beneficent influence of American liberty, morality, and religion, either under our Government or their own, the day will ultimately come when there shall no longer be only the United States of America, but all the nations of the earth shall be joined in one great United States of the World.

THE MONROE DOCTRINE.

In view of the frequency with which the Monroe doctrine is invoked to sustain views, however diverse, connected with the management of Federal affairs relating to our foreign policy, it is a matter of some importance in determining its applicability to any particular state of facts that we shall know a little more definitely than the average American, even though well informed upon other subjects, seems to be as to what the so-called Monroe doctrine actually is.

It might be well to state at the outset that the Monroe doctrine is entirely without the sanction of any direct legislation to give it any binding force. It stands to-day, as it has stood for the last seventy-five years, the expression of a national sentiment, the avowal of a national purpose, the indication of a national determination. But Congress has not, by either statutory enactment or by resolution, during all these seventy-five years, specifically enunciated the Monroe doctrine as a part of the law of the land, although the attempt has been made several times without success, nor has it ever been recognized as a principle of international law by foreign nations.

It was the offspring of an emergency, or, rather, of two emergencies which came so close together and were of so similar a character that President Monroe combined the utterances upon both in his same annual message delivered to Congress December 2, 1823.

It may conduce to a clearer understanding of the language of his message, so far as it enunciates this doctrine, for me to briefly outline the historical events which led to its announcement.

THE ORIGIN OF THE MONROE DOCTRINE.

In 1823 the western coast of North America was an almost unknown land to the civilized world. By treaty with France and Spain and by the explorations of Lewis and Clark we had extended our territory westward from the 13 original colonies with their adjacent possessions east of the Mississippi River until the western boundary included a portion of the present States of Washington and Oregon. The coast south of Oregon was still a portion of the Mexican territory. To the north of Washington Great Britain had already laid claim by reason of discovery, and Russia had already advanced a similar claim to the right of discovery in colonizing other portions to the Pacific coast of the northern continent.

These claims of Russia, Great Britain, and the United States overlapped upon each other, and threatened to involve the three countries in a controversy that would result in war. The actual boundaries of the possessions of the three nations, although not accurately determined, were still in a general way fairly well recognized.

President Monroe, in order to forestall the planting of colonies within any portion of the territory bordering upon the Pacific which then belonged to the United States or was likely ultimately to become a portion of it, announced the views of this Government upon the subject in the following language:

> At the proposal of the Russian Imperial Government, made through the minister of the Emperor residing here, a full power and instructions have been transmitted to the minister of the United States at St. Petersburg to arrange by amicable negotiation the respective rights and interests of the two nations on the northwest coast of this continent. A similar proposal had been made by His Imperial Majesty to the Government of Great Britain, which has likewise been acceded to. The Government of the United States has been desirous by this friendly proceeding of manifesting the great value which they have invariably attached to the friendship of the Emperor and their solicitude to cultivate the best understanding with his Government. In the discussions to which this interest has given rise and in the arrangements by which they may terminate the occasion has been judged proper for asserting, as a principle in which the rights and interests of the United States are involved, that the American continents, by the free and independent condition which they have assumed and maintain, are henceforth not to be considered as subjects for future colonization by any European powers.

The commissions referred to adjusted this controversy satisfactorily, and the emergency which had given rise to the declaration of President Monroe passed away. No similar occasion has since arisen for its reannouncement, and this clause of the Monroe doctrine may be considered as a dead letter at the present time, for the reason that no nation would think of putting forth a claim to any portion of the continent by reason of prior discovery or make an attempt to establish colonies thereon. It may therefore be dismissed without further consideration.

The other two clauses of the Monroe doctrine grew out of a different state of facts.

THE HOLY ALLIANCE.

The balance of power in Europe which originated in the attempt made by France under Richelieu to maintain its supremacy over Austria in the affairs of Europe was rudely shattered by the schemes of conquest which Napoleon Bonaparte was able to carry out so successfully for awhile. He broke the balance of power by practically absorbing all of Europe except Great Britain and Russia in the Empire of France. With his downfall and immediately afterwards a so-called Holy Alliance of the three great powers, Austria, Prussia, and Russia, was established, following the treaty of Chaumont. The purpose of this alliance, as it was announced shortly after, was to intrust in the great powers named therein the right to settle all European questions, and was afterwards extended to nullify all reforms which had been effected by insurrection against the authority of any of these powers and to suppress any institutions or governments whose existence might be attended with danger to the rest of Europe.

Under the authority of this "concert of Europe," as it was called, or the Holy Alliance, Austria had suppressed popular uprisings in Naples and Piedmont; the house of Bourbon had been restored to the throne of Spain; a revolt of the Spanish people had ensued, and France, with the approval of the Holy Alliance, had marched her armies into the peninsula, triumphantly suppressed the will of the people, and restored the Bourbon monarchy.

The former colonies of Spain in South and Central America had but recently revolted and established their independence. It was well understood that when the Holy Alliance should have coerced the rest of Europe into the adoption of their system and the recognition of the divine right of kings, its next step would be to restore to Spain these South American colonies. These colonies had all been recognized as free and independent governments by the United States, and diplomatic representatives had been exchanged between our Government and theirs. We had maintained an absolute neutrality so long as they were struggling for existence, but when the time came which demonstrated, as it has recently in the case of Cuba, the inability of Spain to recover her control of the colonies and the ability of the colonies to maintain their own independent government, a ready recognition had been extended to them by the United States, who welcomed them into the great family of nations.

Up to this point and so long as the object of the alliance was limited to the suppression of republican institutions in Europe and the restoration of the old order of things, which had existed prior to the Napoleonic wars, England, as one of the five great powers, had readily acquiesced in and sanctioned what had been done. But when it became a question of the interference of European nations with the governments established on the Western Continents with the possibility of all this immense territory which had been wrested from Spain being returned to her, England, or more properly Great Britain, became alarmed. The establishment of this vast power which was most certain to receive the sympathy and support of all the continental portion of Europe was looked upon by her as a coming menace to her possessions in Canada and the other provinces of North America which could never arise if the lately established governments in South and Central America were permitted to exist.

THE MONROE DOCTRINE SUGGESTED BY GREAT BRITAIN.

Accordingly we find that the British minister of foreign affairs, Mr. Canning, called the attention of our minister to England, Mr. Rush, to the threatened danger, and proposed that England and the United States should jointly declare against this proposed intrusion of the Holy Alliance into the Western Continent. Our minister, Mr. Rush, immediately communicated the proposition to President Monroe. The latter, while tolerably well determined in his own mind as to the course to be pursued, felt, however, that it involved a question of so much importance and fraught with so momentous responsibility that his judgment should be reenforced by that of others in whom he placed the utmost confidence. He accordingly referred the matter to Thomas Jefferson and James Madison for their consideration and advice.

VIEWS OF JEFFERSON AND MADISON.

As throwing light not only upon the subject before us, but as indicating the wonderful, almost prophetic, discernment of Jefferson concerning the future of Cuba and the possibility of an Anglo-American alliance, which has recently attracted so much attention, I can not refrain from quoting a part of Jefferson's reply in his exact language. He said:

> The question presented by the letters you have sent me is the most momentous which has ever been offered to my contemplation since that of independence that made us a nation; this sets our compass and points the course which we are to steer through the ocean of time opening on our view, and never could we embark on it under circumstances more auspicious. Our first and fundamental maxim should be never to entangle ourselves in the broils of Europe; our second, never to suffer Europe to meddle in cis-Atlantic affairs. America, North and South, has a set of interests distinct from those of Europe and peculiarly her own. She should therefore have a system of her own, separate and apart from that of Europe. While the last is laboring to become the domicile of despotism, our endeavor should surely be to make our hemisphere that of freedom. One nation, most of all, could disturb us in this pursuit; she now offers to lead, aid, and accompany us in it. By acceding to her proposition we detach her from the hand of despots, bring her mighty weight into the scale of free government, and emancipate at one stroke a whole continent which might otherwise linger along in doubt and difficulty.
> Great Britain is the nation which can do us the most harm of any one or all on earth, and with her on our side we need not fear the whole world. With her, then, we should the most sedulously nourish a cordial friendship, and nothing would tend more to knit our affections than to be fighting once more side by side in the same cause. Not that I would purchase even her amity at the price of taking part in her wars. But the war in which the present proposition might engage us, should that be its consequence, is not her war, but ours. Its object is to introduce and to establish the American system of ousting from our land all foreign nations, of never permitting the powers of Europe to intermeddle with the affairs of our nation. It is to maintain our own principles, not to depart from it. And if, to facilitate this, we can effect a division in the body of European powers and draw over to our side its most popular member, surely we should do it.
> But I am clearly of Mr. Canning's opinion that it will prevent war instead of provoking it. With Great Britain withdrawn from their scale and shifted into that of our two continents, all Europe combined would not dare to risk war. Nor is the occasion to be slighted which this proposition offers of declaring our protest against the atrocious violation of the rights of nations by the interference of any one in the internal affairs of another, so flagitiously begun by Bonaparte and now continued by the equally lawless alliance calling itself holy.
> But we have first to ask ourselves a question. Do we wish to acquire to our confederacy any one or more of the Spanish provinces? I candidly confess that I have ever looked on Cuba as the most interesting addition which could ever be made to our system of States. The control which, with Florida Point, this island would give us over the Gulf of Mexico and the countries and the isthmus bordering on it, as well as all those whose waters flow into it, would fill up the measure of our political well-being.
> Yet, as I am sensible that this can never be obtained, even with her own consent, but by war, and as her independence, which is our second interest, and especially her independence of England, can be secured without it, I have no hesitation at abandoning my first wish to future chances and accepting its independence with peace and the friendship of England rather than its association at the expense of a war and her enmity. I could honestly, therefore, join in the declaration proposed, that we aim not at the acquisition of any of these possessions, that we will not stand in the way of any amicable arrangement between them and the mother country, but that we will oppose with all our means the forcible interposition of any other power, either as auxiliary, stipendiary, or under any other form or pretext, and most especially their transfer to any power by conquest, cession, or acquisition in any other way.

Madison replied in a similar manner, although he took occasion to express as his opinion that Canning was not actuated by any desire to advance the cause of liberty, but rather by the desire to preserve the possessions of Great Britain free from the threat of foreign interference.

THE DOCTRINE STATED.

The opinions of these two eminent statesmen so thoroughly coincided with that of President Monroe that he no longer hesitated to incorporate a statement of these views in his coming annual message. He did this in the following language:

> The political system of the allied powers is essentially different in this respect from that of America. This difference proceeds from that which exists in their respective governments; and to the defense of our own, which has been achieved by the loss of so much blood and treasure and matured by the wisdom of their most enlightened citizens, and under which we have enjoyed unexampled felicity, the whole nation is devoted. We owe it, therefore, to candor and to the amicable relations existing between the United States and those powers to declare that we should consider any attempt on their part to extend their system to any portion of this hemisphere as dangerous to our peace and safety. With the existing colonies or dependencies of any European power we have not interfered and shall not interfere. But with the governments who have declared their independence and maintained it, and whose independence we have on great consideration and on just principles acknowledged, we could not view any interposition for the purpose of oppressing them or controlling in any other manner their destiny by any European power in any other light than as the manifestation of an unfriendly disposition toward the United States.

The immediate result of this declaration was the abandonment of the attempt of the Holy Alliance to interfere with the rights or independence of the Spanish-American government.

THE PANAMA CONVENTION.

The first occasion which presented itself after this memorable declaration was issued to construe its full meaning by those who had been most active in its preparation and indorsement grew out of a request for a joint conference of representatives of all the Spanish-American republics to be held at Panama in 1826. To this conference the United States was invited to send a representative. Among the topics which it was officially announced were to be discussed was that of opposition to colonization in America, and also the establishment of what was called a continental system, the object of which was to unite in a common league or alliance all of the governments of the Western Continent for the purpose of resisting the interference of European nations in behalf of Spain in her attempt to reduce her former colonies to submission.

The Official Gazette of Colombia announced as one of the topics to be discussed:

> To take into consideration the means of making effectual the declaration of the President of the United States respecting any ulterior design of a foreign power to colonize any portion of this continent, and also the means of resisting all interference from abroad with the domestic concerns of the American governments.

At the time this proposition was submitted to the United States Government John Quincy Adams, who had been Secretary of State under Monroe, had succeeded to the Presidency. Adams, as a Cabinet officer of his predecessor, had himself suggested and even furnished the language in which the Monroe doctrine so called was declared. He was undoubtedly in thorough sympathy with that doctrine, and in his annual message of December 6, 1825, announced the acceptance of the invitation to this conference and stated that commissioners from the United States would be authorized to attend the conference and to take such part in it as might be compatible with the neutrality which it was the intention of the American States to maintain.

This was followed by a special message to the Senate upon the same subject, dated the 26th of December, 1825. In this the President took occasion to disclaim any intention on the part of the United States of taking part in any deliberations of a belligerent character and announced that the motives of the attendance of our representatives at this Panama Congress was "neither to contract alliances nor to engage in any undertaking or project importing hostilities to any other nation."

After commenting rather pointedly upon the fact that these various Spanish-American States had stipulated with Spain for certain special privileges and concessions in the way of trade regulations, and had also established duties and impositions operating unfavorably to the United States as compared with European nations, he gave them distinctly to understand that it was not the purpose of the United States to interfere with every quarrel that might arise between these Spanish-American Governments and any other nation of Europe, nor was it the intention of our Government to allow them to sit down supinely, making no effort to defend themselves and looking to the United States solely for protection against foreign aggression. His language was as follows:

> An agreement between all the nations represented at the meeting that each will guard by its own means against the establishment of any future European colony within its borders may be found advisable. This was more than two years since announced by my predecessor to the world as a principle resulting from the emancipation of both the American continents. It may be so developed to the new southern nations that they will all feel it as an essential appendage to their independence.

This was followed by an admirable address sent to the House of Representatives on March 15, 1826, in response to an inquiry as to the purposes of the Panama Congress, to which the President, with the consent of the Senate, had already appointed its commissioners. This address would well repay its complete quotation, but the purposes of this paper and the limit of time at my disposal will prevent my using more than one brief citation. After referring to the interest which our own Government had taken in the establishment of the independent Governments of South and Central America, and alluding to the friendly relations which had already grown up between the new governments and our own, he referred to the objection which had been urged to the appointment of the commission, on the ground that it would stir up the antagonism of European nations, in the following patriotic language:

To the question which may be asked, Whether this meeting and the principles which may be adjusted and settled by it as rules of intercourse between the American nations may not give umbrage to the Holy League of European powers or offense to Spain, it is deemed a sufficient answer that our attendance at Panama can give no just cause of umbrage or offense to either, and that the United States will stipulate nothing there which can give such cause. Here the right of inquiry into our purposes and measures must stop. The Holy League of Europe itself was formed without inquiring of the United States whether it would or would not give umbrage to them. The fear of giving umbrage to the Holy League of Europe was urged as a motive for denying to the American nations the acknowledgment of their independence. That it would be viewed by Spain as hostility to her was not only urged, but directly declared by herself. The Congress and Administration of that day consulted their rights and duties, and not their fears. Fully determined to give no needless displeasure to any foreign power, the United States can estimate the probability of their giving it only by the right which any foreign State could have to take it from their measures. Neither the representation of the United States at Panama nor any measure to which their assent may be yielded there will give to the Holy League or any of its members, nor to Spain, the right to take offense; for the rest, the United States must still, as heretofore, take counsel from their duties, rather than from their fears.

CONTROL OVER A PANAMA CANAL.

The next important occasion on which the Monroe doctrine was placed in issue was in regard to the proposed control over an interoceanic canal across the Isthmus of Panama by certain of the European nations. Our Secretary of State, Mr. Frelinghuysen, said, in a letter to the British minister in relation to the assumption of a joint control or a protectorate by several powers over such canal in case it should be constructed, that the President would not consent to or look with indifference upon such an intervention in American affairs; that such a protectorate by European nations over the Isthmus transit would be in conflict with the American doctrine many years asserted by distinguished citizens, believed in by the people, and approved by Great Britain, and that a protectorate over the proposed canal would seriously affect and threaten our political interests.

It was again made the subject of expression by Blaine while Secretary of State in connection with certain provisions of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty which seemed to permit the occupancy of territory in Nicaragua by Great Britain, and Blaine, in his vigorous style, condemned these provisions as contrary to the Monroe doctrine, and they have since been repudiated.

THE INTERFERENCE OF THE FRENCH IN MEXICO.

The attempt of the French Government during our civil war to interfere in the affairs of Mexico, overturn its existing Government, and place the unfortunate Maximilian upon the throne of a kingdom dominated by foreign influence, led to a most vigorous protest on the part of this Government and ultimately toward the movement of troops toward the Mexican frontier for the enforcement of our demand for recognition of the principle of the Monroe doctrine as applied to the condition of affairs then existing. Bloodshed was averted by the withdrawal of the French forces, but the very fact of this peaceable yielding on the part of France to our demands was itself a practical acknowledgment of the justice of the doctrine.

THE VENEZUELA BOUNDARY DISPUTE.

Finally, to bring the doctrine down to its latest episode, we must refer to the Venezuelan boundary question, which threatened serious complications between this Government and Great Britain during the Cleveland Administration. This dispute is of so recent a date that you are no doubt all familiar with its details. It grew out of the attempt of Great Britain to extend her possessions in her colony of Guiana into territory claimed by Venezuela as her own. There was an overlapping of the two claims. The disputed territory, while small in area, was important and valuable to either country by reason of rich deposits of gold and other minerals contained therein. Great Britain, with her usual policy of enforcing her demands by her military and naval strength, was proposing to take possession of this territory against what seemed to our Government to be at least an unsettled and disputed claim of Venezuela which appeared to be just and equitable. The United States assumed the part of an intermediator as between the greater and the weaker power and succeeded in obtaining the consent to the appointment of arbitrators to settle the disputed boundary. This commission is still in existence, and we have no reason to doubt that its findings will be submitted to by both of the Governments interested.

Thus we have brought in a hurried manner the discussion of the Monroe doctrine and the various cases in which it has arisen down to the present time. It would appear plain, it seems, that this doctrine is one which grew out of the demand for self-protection of our country against European encroachments. A portion of it has undoubtedly become obsolete, for the reason that we can conceive of no case arising in the future to which the clause in relation to colonization will apply; and as to the other portion of it, it is equally clear that it applies only to the conduct of affairs in this Western Hemisphere, and in no way affects the policy of our Government in relation to our interference in the affairs of other nations, either in this hemisphere or the other. It in no way affects the right of this Government to acquire and hold as the legitimate fruits of war any of the territory we have captured from Spain in our recent war, and any attempt to cite the Monroe doctrine as an estoppel to our right of expansion in any direction or to any extent is an extension of that doctrine not warranted either by the occasion which gave rise to its enunciation, the historical precedents in which it has been applied and enforced, or by any authority vested in the President or in Congress to curtail the inherent rights of sovereignty possessed by every independent nation, and one of the attributes of which is the right to acquire territory, without limit as to extent, location, or character, either by purchase, cession, voluntary annexation, or by treaty as a result of conquest.

THE RESULTS OF A WAR MAY DIFFER FROM THOSE EXPECTED.

It is no answer to this to assert that the war with Spain was founded upon a humanitarian basis and was solely to put an end to the barbarities practiced upon the inhabitants of Cuba, and that the nation had no thought of the acquisition of territory as the result of that war.

Few wars in history have worked out precisely the end in view at the time they were begun. Two striking instances of this are recorded in our own annals. It is well known that the Revolutionary war was inaugurated with no thought of an absolute separation of the colonies from the mother country. Its purpose was to secure a redress of wrongs and a reformation of the colonial government.

It was with hesitation and reluctance that the statesmen of that day reached the conclusion that the only remedy for existing evils was a complete independence, and that conclusion was reached only after the actual war had been in progress many months. The result was unforeseen when the minute men at Lexington and the yeomanry at Bunker Hill sounded the first tocsins of war. Yet none the less we accepted the destiny that was mapped out for us and became an independent people.

The civil war was waged for the preservation of the Union. There was little or no thought of destroying the institution of slavery, and had the North triumphed in a few decisive battles at its outbreak and won a peace before the issue of the emancipation proclamation, its end would have been accomplished without resulting in the breaking of the shackles which fettered the limbs of the colored people of the South. Thus the actual purposes for which a war may be inaugurated and the results which may come from that war are sometimes widely diverse. But whatever may have been the motive which fires the first gun in deadly conflict, the responsibility of accepting its results rests equally upon the victor and the vanquished. We, as the victors in the recent struggle, can not shirk, even if we would, the duties which it has imposed upon us. We owe a duty to ourselves, to the inhabitants of the conquered land, and to the world at large, and this duty we are ready to assume and to perform with that same faith in republican institutions, that same love for human freedom, and that same trust in Divine Providence which has shaped our course as a nation during our century and a quarter of existence.

There are conscientious men, no doubt many of them, who look with foreboding on the new departure upon which we seem about to enter. They decry what they style the spirit of imperialism which has seized upon the nation; they point out that we are departing from the teachings of the father of the Republic; they would circumscribe our energies to the confines of this continent; they opposed, sincerely, I believe, many of them, the acquisition of Hawaii; they demur to the retention of Porto Rico; they lift a finger of warning against the hoped for and expected request of Cuba to come into our Union; they speak in tones of dread of the retention of a part or all of the Philippines; they would have us turn back the dial of time six months in the history of the world and surrender to Spain her conquered islands.

THE OBJECTIONS TO EXPANSION ARE NOT NEW.

The same opposition and the same voices of warning were raised at each accession of territory which came to us, whether by purchase or conquest, from the time we were but the thirteen original colonies. The purchase of Florida and of the Louisiana Territory, the accession of Texas, and the territory obtained from Mexico, all found ready opposition on the part of those who were opposed to expansion. And yet, when we look over this vast expanse of acquired territory, with its millions of happy and prosperous human beings breathing in the pure atmosphere of freedom under the benign influences of the American Constitution, how false have proven these prophecies of disaster. Our whole history has been one of expansion.

The words of Washington in his Farewell Address are entitled to the reverent admiration of every American citizen. Construed as they should be with reference to the conditions which existed at the time he gave them to the world, and with the announced purpose of preserving our country from entangling alliances with European nations until we should be strong enough to stand alone in defense of our rights and liberties, they were the wisest utterances of his time. But a hundred years have wrought a mighty change in the world. We are no longer a weak and struggling people, fearful lest the liberties which we had acquired at the cost of so much blood and treasure should be snatched from us by a powerful foe. We stand to-day a mighty nation, the mightiest, in many respects, of any on earth.

We need no alliances for our own protection; we will make none to our detriment. That Providence which shapes the ends of nations as of men is working out for us a future of which we had but little thought a few short months ago. In the language of Jefferson already quoted, the war, the events of which have forced themselves so rapidly upon us, "sets our compass and points the course which we are to steer in the ocean of time opening on our view." We, as a Christian nation, look forward to the coming of that millennium when all the world shall be at peace, and those who look justly upon the grave and momentous questions that confront us can not but feel that as the chosen instruments of this Divine plan we are most surely and most certainly bringing nearer to its realization the promise of this day of peace by extending to the suffering and oppressed of foreign countries the beneficent influences of American civilization and the genius of our free institutions.

WE CAN TRUST THE PRESENT EXECUTIVE.

We have to-day in the Executive Mansion at Washington a man of the purest and loftiest type of patriotism, a Christian gentleman, a statesman the equal of any that the history of our country has known, conservative yet progressive; a man to whom justice and honor, personal and official, are the guiding stars of his conduct; a man who, whilst reverencing the traditions of the fathers, is wise enough to recognize the fact that the world is moving on, and that new conditions impose new obligations and demand the performance of new duties. Let us, then, as good, patriotic American citizens, trust to that wisdom, conservatism, and patriotism which have ever distinguished his course in public affairs and uphold his hands in the discharge of the trying duties that we have devolved upon our honored President, William McKinley.

I have thus briefly sketched the Monroe doctrine of the past and of the present. But what of the future? The doctrine of the past was one suited to our conditions as a weak and timid nation. The Monroe doctrine of the present, as applied to the Venezuela case and announced to the strongest nation on earth, is the sentiment of a nation self-reliant, mature in experience and development, fearing no opposition when assured of the justice of its cause, counting no odds too great, courting no alliance, but ready and willing, if necessary, to submit even to the final arbitrament of the sword the justice of its cause and its right to protect not only itself but its weaker neighbors from the rapacity and encroachment of other nations.

Mr. HULL. Mr. Chairman, I yield twenty minutes to my colleague from Iowa [Mr. HEPBURN].

Mr. HEPBURN. Mr. Chairman, the objections offered to the pending bill are somewhat various. One gentleman objects to it because he says that it raises a standing army that is to be used—to quote him literally—"to shoot labor in the back." Another one tells us it is to be used to subvert human liberty in the Republic. Another tells us it is to be used to rewrite the Declaration of Independence, to make a new Constitution, from which we shall leave out all reference to liberty, equality of human rights, the doctrine that governments derive their just powers from the consent of the governed, and to start out upon a mission of hostility to all the world that differ from us in form of government and to begin wars of subjugation and territorial expansion.

These gentlemen who fear that this measure proposes to shoot labor in the back fail, it seems to me, to realize of whom this army is to be composed, from where they come, or that there is an army of laborers, 23,000,000 in number, of men, women, and youths, who are to be shot in the back. Why, Mr. Chairman, where will this army come from? From the homes and the firesides of this land. They are to be citizens of the United States; they are to be men who have learned the lessons of liberty from liberty-loving fathers and mothers; they are to come from the great labor fields in the United States; they are to be recruited from this great army of 23,000,000 people. Are they by their mere enlistment to be changed in nature at once? Are they at once to learn to hate the liberty they have always been taught to love? Are they to become enemies of the class from which they sprang? Are they to assail their fathers, mothers, brothers, and sisters that are now in the labor field and who it is said they are to "shoot in the back?" No man believes that, in my humble judgment. It is but the catchword of those who are seizing upon this opportunity to bolster up the falling fortunes of a decaying political party. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. Chairman, gentlemen have quoted illustrious names, and chief of them that of Thomas Jefferson, as unalterably opposed to a large standing army. Gentlemen must remember that when we have secured 100,000 men our standing army will not be larger in proportion to our area, in proportion to our population, in proportion to our necessities than was the standing army of which Thomas Jefferson was the advocate, and that he aided as Chief Executive of this nation in raising, and which he commanded as Commander in Chief. I suppose that when he indulged in the utterance he had in his mind that the Army must have proper relation to the wants and the interests of the country. And I can not see that this Army that we propose will be disproportionate to the one that he thought in his judgment was ample, and only ample, for the needs of the people, when we had 5,000,000 people the day he was inaugurated President of the United States.

Then we had 5,000,000; now we have 75,000,000 people. Then we had 800,000 square miles of territory; now more than 4,000,000 square miles of territory. Then there was not a settlement beyond the Mississippi River; now there are great States, an empire that he never even dreamed of when most hopeful for the future of his country. Gentlemen have made this the occasion of an assault on the President of the United States in his administration of this Government during the last year I think unfairly; I think without the candor that ought to have been theirs on a grave occasion like this. They have said that the President of the United States had pressed a war upon the liberty of the people of the Philippine Islands; that he pressed a war of conquest; that he had departed from those pledges that the nation made a year ago when we entered upon the war with Spain. I believe those charges to be unjust.

Mr. Chairman, we ought to discriminate, it seems to me, between the purpose of the war with Spain and some of the results of the war with Spain. Gentlemen tell us that we are about to take the territory of the Philippines. Ah, not so. Dewey took that territory on the 1st of May last. [Applause.] Dewey created the situation that exists to-day. It is not for the President to create a new situation, a new condition, but to deal with the one that came in the natural progress of events that we all hoped for. Every gentleman upon that side of the House hoped that we might be successful in our war with Spain. National pride, love of country, love for those that constituted our gallant Army and our Navy, compelled them to hope that victory would come to us, that we would overcome our enemy.

How was that to be done? How? Only in three ways: Overcoming his military forces, destroying his revenues, or capturing or conquering his territory—the three objects of war, the only means by which we can assail the enemy, each legitimate and each right. When we entered upon that war every patriot hoped that we would overcome the military power of the enemy; every one hoped that we would be able to cripple their revenues; every one hoped we would occupy their territory, and that we would be the conquerors of more or less of their domain. Did you not? You anticipated that? Surely as patriots you must.

Now, just what you expected came. And you now say that the declarations that we made in regard to Cuba, the object of the war, shall be applied to all of the results of the war. There is no pledge of that kind. That territory is ours. It is ours by the right of conquest; it is ours by the laws of nations; it is our property. We can invest, when we please, in the good time that we may determine, the independence of that territory of ours with just such political rights as we choose. It is for us to determine—the Congress—and not the President of the United States. He simply, in his connection with them, is the Commander in Chief. It is for this body, and the one at the other end of the Capitol, to inaugurate the policies that shall determine the political rights of the people that are now occupying our territory.

But, gentlemen say—and here is where the greatest unfairness has been manifested—they say that the President is now inaugurating a rule of conquest; that he is going to rewrite the Declaration of Independence; that he is going to deprive certain people of their liberties. When you ask them for the proof, they say to us, "Did he not, in a speech recently made, state that 'the American flag had been planted in two hemispheres, who will take it down?'" And, therefore, they argue, that the flag is there to be maintained by force, against the will of the people, in subversion of liberty, and out of harmony with the declaration which we have heretofore made in our Constitution, in our State and national bill of rights, and in the Declaration of Independence.

Ah, Mr. Chairman, it is most unfair, unfair to charge the President of the United States with a crime against liberty and then pretend to prove it in the way you have. What do we, as practicing lawyers, say of that man who will assume to read to the court an authority, and garble it, read a sentence here, leaving out connecting explanatory sentences, give it a meaning not intended? We brand him as a shyster, and where the bar is self-respecting, we drive him from it, condemned as unworthy of the confidence, respect, and association of decent practitioners. Let me suggest the correct reading of that quotation. The President says:

> That flag has been planted in two hemispheres, and there it remains, the symbol of liberty and law, of peace and progress. Who will withdraw from the people over whom it floats its protecting folds? Will the people of the South help to haul it down?

That is what the President said; that is the declaration and his inquiry. There the flag is planted over these people, symbolizing to them that they are now entering upon a new existence of liberty, law, of peace and progress. Yet gentlemen here of his own party, who helped to elect him, who heretofore have given adhesion to their belief in his integrity and his statesmanship, garble that quotation, garble it, I say, for the purpose of sustaining a statement that it is his purpose to overthrow the liberty, to do away with the peace, to check the progress, to take from these people the benefits of the war. Shame on the cause, shame on the man, that needs to bolster up a cause by such misrepresentation.

Nothing that the President has done, nothing that he has said, justifies this assault. Nor has anything been done or said that justifies any gentleman in believing that the majority propose, when the proper time comes in their treatment of that people, to do other than that which we propose to extend to those who live nearer to our shores.

We have said that—

> The United States disclaims any disposition or intention to exercise sovereignty, jurisdiction, or control over Cuba except for the pacification thereof, and asserts its determination, when that is accomplished, to leave the government and control of the island to the people.

Who doubts that that is the purpose of the Administration? Who believes that there exists in the minds of any considerable number of people in the United States a thought other than that of giving them pacification, giving them opportunity to establish order and law under such a form of government, and with proper safeguards to liberty, as they choose. And that will be the time, I will say to my friend from Tennessee, when we should "sail away."

Why should we not pursue precisely the same course toward the people of the Philippine Islands? There is much more of interest to us in seeking the immediate and forceful annexation of Cuba than there is in seeking it in those distant seas. We need probably coaling stations for the purpose of aiding our expanding commerce. Is there any gentleman that asks for more? We shall, I doubt not, true to all the traditions marked out for ourselves, pursue in their case the same course that we marked out for the people of Cuba. We will pacify their disorders; we will expel anarchy; we will give the people an opportunity to express their wishes—to form a purpose and then to form a government—and when they are self-sustaining and self-supporting, when they are able to maintain the government they have erected, then will be the time for us to "sail away" from Manila, and not till then. [Loud applause.]

Mr. HULL. I yield fifteen minutes to the gentleman from Oregon [Mr. TONGUE].

Mr. TONGUE. Mr. Chairman, the responsibility for the unusual conditions that now confront us can be charged or credited to no one branch of the Government, to neither House of Congress, to no section of the country, to no political organization. There was a time when the preservation of peace seemed to be in the hands of the President. Again, the question of peace or war between Spain and our own people seemed to be in the keeping of Congress. But there came a time when neither the President, nor the Senate, nor this House, nor all combined, could have prevented the conflict between the armies of Spain and the people of the United States. When the long career of Spanish cruelty, oppression, and bloodshed culminated in the destruction of the Maine and the murder of American sailors on a mission of peace and friendship, no human power could have stayed the hand of vengeance, or could have prevented the American people from meting out adequate justice and retribution for the greatest crime of the century.

The duty of the President and Congress became merely that of furnishing money and leadership for the prosecution of a war that could not be avoided or delayed. The successful termination of this conflict has changed our attitude to Spain. While at peace we demanded only the relinquishment of Spanish sovereignty over Cuba. Victory entitles us to demand not only this, but compensation for the sacrifice in bloodand treasure the conflict has entailed upon us. With victory has come duties and responsibilities that it would be cowardly to evade, opportunities that it would be criminal to neglect. Let us consider them as we did the declaration of war—as Americans, without sectional, partisan, or personal bitterness.

But, Mr. Chairman, in the storm and tumult of discussion of these questions growing out of the annexation of territory, whither are we drifting? Would it not be well to inspect the compass and take our bearings? Is it profitable to indulge so much in speculation about future problems rather than those demanding present attention and present action? Why attempt to surmount difficulties that will never arise? Why assume and discuss conditions that do not, that never will exist? Why conjure up an imaginary tyranny to be erected and maintained by the American people, which every lover of freedom knows never will be constructed or tolerated by freemen? Are there not enough present duties to perform, questions to settle, and difficulties to surmount now, today, and during this Congress? We know too little of existing conditions, the capacities or will of the people, to determine upon a plan of future government for the people of the islands.

It was contended yesterday by the gentleman from Indiana that the inhabitants of the Philippine Islands have in operation a full government—executive, legislative, and judicial—of their own selection. I do not know that such a government exists. I do not believe that it exists. Had opportunity been given, I should have liked to ask the gentleman some questions, and obtain, if possible, some information upon that subject. But the distinguished gentleman's desire to question others, and to dictate the form of their answers to his own questions, was exceeded only by his eagerness to evade being questioned himself. I trust that gentleman will yet inform the House and country who provided for this election? When and where was it had? Under whose control? Upon how much, and what kind of notice? What was the qualification for exercising the right of suffrage? Who and how many were the electors? How were the ballots taken? How and by whom counted? Of the eight or ten millions of people inhabiting those islands, how many voted? How many ballots were cast in Manila or Iloilo?

But if we know little of them, the people of the Philippine Islands know less of us; less of our institutions than we do of theirs. Not only this, but their ignorance and passions are being inflamed by fraud, by falsehood, by deceit, and by slanderers of Americans and American institutions, in the Philippine Islands, in the press there and here, and in both ends of this Capitol. On both sides, in both countries, we need more light. Our future policy in the Philippine Islands, the nature of the government we may conclude to establish, the extent of suffrage, trial by jury, questions of tariff policy, and others of like nature—all these problems will be better solved next year than now; better in two years than in one; better in three years than in two.

But what are the conditions now existing, and with which we must deal, and ought to deal at once? A few weeks ago the Philippine Islands were a part of the Spanish empire. They were as much a part of that empire as the Ladrones or Porto Rico. Spanish authority was supreme and uncontested. They were under laws enacted by Spain, administered by Spaniards. They knew no other laws, no other authorities. American arms and courage in the shock of battle changed these conditions and broke the power of Spain. We destroyed the only recognized government in the Philippine Islands, the only government that those people have known or recognized for centuries. The cannons of Dewey and Otis repealed every law, disarmed every officer, and removed the last vestige of every lawful authority but our own. We have destroyed the only power, the only government, the only authority that did or could furnish protection to person or property.

Now, what shall we do? Not next year, or in ten years, but now, in this Congress? Shall we leave them to anarchy or their own fierce contentions? Shall we stand aloof while the civilization, the wealth, and the intelligence in the cities shall be engaged in a bloody contest for existence and life with barbarous hordes from the mountains? Where would it end? Who would eventually be supreme? Of the vast number of tribes likely to contend for supremacy which will be the victor? Which will ultimately control the fortunes of the islands? Or are we to leave these islands "a derelict in the ocean," a prize to be contended for either in the market or in the arena of armed conflict between the powers of Europe?

Those who talk of Philippine independence must remember that the Filipinos have not won independence. Without the ratification of the Spanish-American treaty and the payment of American money, the sovereignty of Spain in those islands will not be relinquished, but will be reasserted. All of Spanish pride, of Spanish interest, of Spanish cruelty will be aroused for the subjugation of those islands. Shall we who waged the late war because the tyranny of Spain in Cuba could no longer be endured subject the Philippine islands to unrestricted exercise of Spanish cruelty, of Spanish tyranny, and of unchecked Weylerism? Shall we withdraw our forces and witness there the repetition of the butchery and starvation, the untold and indescribable cruelty, that marked the bloody history of Spanish rule in Spain?

If Spain is unable to subjugate them, is it to be doubted for one moment that she would procure foreign assistance, either by ceding a portion of the islands or by selling the entire group to some foreign power that would conquer and subjugate them? Is it in the interest of humanity that we are to assist in bringing about any of these conditions? Who can tell the results of such a conflict? How will it affect the islands? How will it affect other nations? How will it affect the peace of the world? What would be its result upon our own interests, upon our own trade, in Asiatic countries? Would it strengthen the policy that permits us to trade upon the same conditions with other civilized nations in China, Japan, and other Asiatic ports, or would it tend to close them against American trade and against American commerce? The consequences of any such conduct are too fearful to contemplate, and could result only in untold disaster. Every instinct of humanity, every dictate of duty to the inhabitants of those islands, to civilization, to Christianity, to humanity, and to ourselves, forbid such a course of conduct.

We can not turn these islands back to Spain. We can not permit or consent for them to be returned. We can not abandon them to a reign of anarchy, cruelty, and bloodshed more terrible even than the tyranny of Spain. We can not permit them to be the subject of competition between the powerful governments of Europe. Having destroyed the only government they had, it is our imperative duty to substitute something in its place. Having destroyed their laws, we must give them others. Having removed their protectors, we must ourselves become their protectors. We must restore order. We must establish constituted and lawful authority. We must enthrone the supremacy of the law. We must furnish protection for life, liberty, reputation, property. We must maintain a government capable of protecting not only Aguinaldo and his savages from the mountains, but civilization, intelligence, and property in the cities. This is a duty we can not escape if we would; we ought not to escape it if we could. To properly perform this duty, the authority of this Government must be asserted, maintained, and rendered supreme. Those who are opposing this are fighting not for liberty, but for anarchy and the right to plunder.

The problem now before us, pressing for immediate solution, is how to establish such a government, giving the greatest amount of protection to life, liberty, and property, with the greatest measure of personal liberty and political freedom, and as much a government by the people of the islands themselves as is consistent with the safety of all classes of the inhabitants. To the solution of this important and pressing problem there are those upon the floors of this Congress, in both ends of the Capitol, who contribute nothing but indiscreet utterances, every word of which will be paid for by the life of an American soldier at Manila.

Those gentlemen who have no words of praise for their own Government, for American institutions, American civilization, or anything American, who denounce the government to be established under Dewey and Otis as equal to the butchery and tyranny of Weyler, who describe their own Government "as a counterpart of the one of Spain, and as willing to become one of the vultures hovering around China, preparing to devour her when she becomes a carcass," who allege that we are now waging a war "to establish despotism in another country, and to destroy the liberty of its people," a war that "is a crime against liberty, and the curse of God is upon it," who are describing the government that we may establish as "a tyranny, and that rebellion against it would be a duty, and not a crime," who describe the public utterances of the Chief Magistrate of a free people as "a nasty and reeking mess that is set before us, fit only for obscene birds and beasts of prey," are lending no aid to their own Government.

On the contrary, by their intemperate speech and incendiary utterances they are encouraging and strengthening armed resistance to the lawful authority of this Government. They are furnishing hope, encouragement, and moral support to Aguinaldo and his barbarians. Their speeches are filling insurgent ranks, nerving insurgent arms, and firing insurgent hearts. They are shotting guns to be fired into the ranks of American soldiers. They are whetting knives to be plunged into American bosoms. They are preparing to make American wives widows, American mothers childless, and to slaughter the flower of American manhood in Manila.

I must insist that until we have restored order in the Philippines, until we have established some government, asserted and maintained its supremacy, until we have given to the inhabitants of those islands protection for all they have and for all they hold dear, until we have broken down armed resistance to the lawful authority of this Government, it is the duty, imperative duty, of every patriotic American citizen to stand shoulder to shoulder, side by side, in supporting the Administration in every laudable effort to bring about this result.

A prompt ratification of the treaty, a united people loyally supporting the Administration of our own country, and even now peace would prevail. An unratified treaty and divided counsels paralyze the executive arm and furnish insurgent opportunities.

Oh, but we are told, we have no right to govern these people. We have not obtained "the consent of the governed." While this question will arise hereafter, it does not arise now. We are not going to annex Cuba, but none question our right to maintain order, to establish the supremacy of law, to enforce the authority of the United States through the entire island, and to constitute and maintain a lawful government until the wishes of the Cuban people may be ascertained in an orderly, regular, and accurate manner. Shall we do less for the Filipinos? Are they more capable of organizing present government than the people in Cuba? Is Aguinaldo, who betrayed his countrymen, more statesman than Gomez and the Cuban leaders?

Have we the consent of the one more than the other? Is not our duty to one as imperative as to the other? Before the consent of the people of the Philippine Islands could be taken to anything, before their wishes could be known, order must be restored, armed resistance to constituted authority must be overcome, and the supremacy of the law must be maintained. But have we no right to govern the people of the Philippine Islands? Let us see. A few weeks ago these islands were a part of Spain. The Spanish Government was supreme; its authority was undisputed. As a part of the Spanish Empire they waged war against the United States. Oh, do not tell me that some of them did not. The constituted authorities, the people who controlled the islands and its government and its resources did, and the government of a country makes war or maintains peace and determines its attitude as a friend or enemy to other countries.

These islands furnished a basis of supplies for armed enemies. They furnished food and shelter and a harbor of refuge to a hostile fleet that threatened our commerce and the cities and trade on the Pacific coast. The Filipinos were either unwilling or unable to prevent this. We had a right to make war upon them. We had a right to capture them. We had a right to take possession of them, and we had a right to retain them as the fruits of victory. What has the consent of the governed to do in a case like this? When a hostile army or a hostile navy confronts you must you ask the enemy's consent to be conquered? After being conquered, must we ask his consent to submit to the consequences of his defeat? Must the victor ask the consent of the vanquished to settle the terms of peace and to pay the expenses of the conflict? Do we destroy civil liberty unless we ask the consent of the convicted felon to imprison him?

Have we undermined the rights of property if we enforce execution against the property of a judgment debtor? As the victors in the late war, we had a right to hold the Philippine Islands as the fruits of victory and as a compensation for our loss. And now Aguinaldo, who had sold his birthright and had become an exile for a consideration, whom we restored to the country he had sold and the people he had betrayed, proposes to slip in and appropriate to himself the fruits of our victory.

But outside of this, have we not as much the consent of the people of the islands as any annexed nation ever gave? We have the consent of the only Government in force, the only Government the people recognized, the only Government that they have known for three hundred years, the Government that exercised undisputed sway and control of every particle of civil and military authority.

Spain's title to these islands was as complete as any title she ever had to Florida or Louisiana. We dealt with the Philippine Islands as every nation deals with another nation, by dealing with the government that represents, controls, and is in the possession of the actual sovereignty. Even the Senator from Massachusetts admits that it is "impossible in dealing with a people to deal with anything but the established government." We have as much the consent of the Filipinos to administer the government over them as we have to-day the consent of the people of Alaska to administer government there. Strange uses are being made of this portion of the Declaration of Independence. A meaning is given never intended by the author of the sentiment that we now hear so often quoted.

The pilgrim fathers did not wait upon Plymouth Rock for the "consent of the governed" before taking possession of this continent. The framers of the Declaration of Independence organized a government in the Northwest Territory without consulting a single inhabitant. Men who had signed the Declaration of Independence proceeded to organize State governments, and proceeded to govern the illiterate, landless, and those who did not belong to some Christian sect, without asking their consent. Massachusetts did not ask the consent of its illiterate. Connecticut, New York, Maryland, North Carolina, South Carolina, and Pennsylvania proceeded to govern those who were without real estate without their consent.

Mississippi and other States are disfranchising large numbers, if not a majority, of their male citizens without their consent. We did not consult the inhabitants of Louisiana, of Florida, of Texas, of New Mexico, of California, of Alaska, or of the Hawaiian Islands, before annexing them. Within the memory of this generation, we expended billions of treasures and sacrificed hundreds of thousands of valuable lives to force upon the people of a part of this country a government to which they did not consent.

If this declaration means that before government can exercise its authority it must have the direct expressed consent of the governed, then there is no government on the face of the earth where this doctrine is maintained. We are governing more than one-half of the territory of the United States without ever having attempted to gain this consent.

There is not a single member upon this floor who has the expressed consent of one-fifth of the inhabitants of his district. There are 65,000,000 people in the United States who have not consented to be governed by the President of the United States or by the members of either House of this Congress. There is nowhere in the whole land a citizen of the United States who has given his expressed consent to be governed under the Constitution and laws of the United States. Some of the gentlemen who are now most solicitous that government should be "with the consent of the governed" occupy their present positions on this floor by the expressed consent of less than one-twentieth of the population of their districts. Should this spasm of virtue continue until after another election, it is difficult to predict the results upon the complexion of another Congress. This "consent of the governed" can mean nothing more than implied consent, and is generally expressed by acquiescence. In dealing with a nation we must deal with it as a unit, we must deal with it through the constituted authorities, through the de facto government in whose authority the inhabitants acquiesce. We must assume that it is with their consent, and must deal with it accordingly.

The consent of the governed must always yield for the public good and for the good of the governed themselves. We restrain the criminal and insane for the good of the public. We place a guardian over the imbecile, the dissolute, the spendthrift, for their own good. To govern with the "consent of the governed" and by the aid of the governed is an ideal that should be constantly kept in view and to which all liberty-loving nations should aspire. It is the ideal to which the American people not only aspire, but which they have more nearly approached than any other nation of ancient or modern history. To enable the American people to attain this high ideal should be the earnest desire and constant aim of every patriotic statesman and citizen. We shall abolish the prison and the asylum when there are no criminals or insane. When people cease to be imbeciles or spendthrifts or dissolute, we shall abolish their guardians.

A government by the "consent of the governed" will not attain its full perfection, a government "by the people" will not be a government by all the people, until all the people are endowed with great intelligence, are inspired by justice, devoted to humanity, possess great self-control and great capacity for self-government. Under the American flag the Filipinos will have what has been denied them for three hundred years—personal and political liberty. They will at all times have all the self-government consistent with their own freedom, their own welfare, and their own safety.

But we are told that even if we have the right so far as the Philippine Islands are concerned to annex them, this Congress has not been authorized by the American people to accept them, and that annexation is a violation of the Constitution of the United States.

I am getting wearied with this constant discussion of imaginary constitutional questions. Did the Constitution prohibit to the American people the exercise of one-half the privileges it is claimed on this floor that it prohibits, we should be a nation of slaves and serfs rather than freemen. "Unconstitutional" has lost its meaning and become "undesirable" to the unconstitutional objector. To give credence to one-half we hear, the Constitution is being violated from beginning to end about every other day in the 365 days of each year. The Constitution survived the purchase and annexation of Florida, of Alaska, of the western half of the territory of the United States, of Hawaii, and it will survive the annexation of Porto Rico, of the Ladrone Islands, and the Philippines. It seems singular that this argument should be used now. It seems still more strange that the disciples of Jefferson, the first great American annexationist, should make this contention and appeal to Moses, the first great expansionist and forcible annexationist, to support this contention. It seems still more strange that those professing adherence to the political party that since the formation of the Constitution has annexed one-half of the present territory of the United States should make this claim.

I think we are beginning to concede that the United States is a nation. It is too late now to question that doctrine. It is too firmly established. It has been sanctioned by the Supreme Court of the United States. It has been established still more firmly in the shock of battle, from whose rude decisions there is no appeal. Somewhere in this nation there is national sovereignty. There is a power to deal as a nation with other nations. The right to declare war, the right to make treaties and settle the terms of peace, is vested by the Constitution in the President and the Congress of the United States. The right of the President and Senate to make and ratify treaties with other nations is absolute and unlimited. The President and Congress are vested with full, complete, and absolute power to settle the terms of peace. They have full power, at the termination of war, to collect the expenses and costs of the conflict from the vanquished in cash or territory. The Constitution nowhere, in any manner, attempts to limit or control the exercise of this authority. This has been sanctioned by the highest judicial authority of the land on numerous occasions.

The Supreme Court of the United States, in a decision delivered by Judge Gray (in 149 U. S., page 711), decided:

> The United States are a sovereign and independent nation, and are vested by the Constitution with the entire control of international relations, and with all the powers of the Government necessary to maintain that control and to make it effective. The only government in this country which other nations recognize or treat with is the Government of the Union, and the only American flag that is known throughout the world is the flag of the United States.

To the same effect is the opinion of Judge Field (in 130 U. S., pages 603, 604, 605):

> While under our Constitution and form of government the great mass of local matters is controlled by local authorities, the United States, in their relation to foreign countries and their subjects or citizens, are one nation, invested with powers which belong to independent nations, the exercise of which can be invoked for the maintenance of its absolute independence and security throughout its entire territory.

Chief Justice Marshall delivered the opinion of the Supreme Court (in Cohens vs. Virginia, 6 Wheaton, 264), which decides—

> That the United States form, for many and for most important purposes, a single nation has not yet been denied. In war we are one people. In making peace we are one people. In all commercial relations we are one and the same people. In many other respects the American people are one, and the Government, which is alone capable of controlling and managing their interests in all these respects, is the Government of the Union. It is their Government, and in that character they have no other.

Justice Bradley, in delivering the opinion of the Supreme Court in Knox vs. Lee (12 Wall., 457), states:

> The United States is not only a Government, but it is a National Government and the only Government in this country that has the character of nationality. It is invested with power over all the foreign relations of the country—war, peace, and negotiations and intercourse with other nations—all which are forbidden to the State governments.

In the case of the American Insurance Company vs. Canter (1 Peter, page 511), in which Chief Justice Marshall delivered the opinion, the Supreme Court decided that:

> The Constitution of the United States confers absolutely on the Government of the Union the power of making war and of making treaties; consequently that Government possesses the power of acquiring territory either by conquest or by treaty.

Mr. Caleb Cushing, when Attorney-General of the United States, in one of his opinions gave his views upon this subject as follows:

> The power which the Constitution bestows upon the President, with advice and consent of the Senate, to make treaties is not only general and without express limitation, but it is accompanied with absolute prohibition of exercise of treaty power by the States. That is, in the matter of foreign negotiation the States have conferred the whole of their power, in other words, all the treaty powers of sovereignty, on the United States. Thus, in the present case, if the power of negotiation be not in the United States, then it exists nowhere, and one great field of international relation or negotiation and of ordinary public and private interest is closed up, as well against the United States as each and every one of the States. That is not a supposition to be accepted unless it be forced upon us by considerations of overpowering cogency. Nay, it involves political impossibility. For if one of the power functions of sovereignty be thus utterly lost to us, then the people of the United States are but incompletely sovereign, not sovereign nor in coequality of right with other admitted sovereignties of Europe and America.

Mr. Gallatin, Secretary of the Treasury under President Jefferson, wrote a letter to the President, containing the following:

> First. That the United States, as a nation, have an inherent right to acquire territory.
> Second. That whenever that acquisition is by treaty, the same authorities in whom the treaty-making power is vested have a constitutional right to sanction the acquisition.

Acting upon this view, the Congress of the United States authorized the acquisition of Louisiana.

Even Judge Taney, in the discarded Dred Scott decision, admits that the power in the Federal Government "to enlarge its territory and limits by the admission of new States is plainly given."

On any other principle this Government would be denied a power possessed by the smallest nations on earth. It would be powerless to purchase a coaling station, a naval station, a concession for the Nicaraguan Canal, a cable station, or a rock upon which to erect a light-house.

The practice of this Government from the time of those who made the Constitution until now has been in accordance with this power. This question has been settled too long and too uniformly to be questioned now.

But we are told we should declare our future intentions in reference to these islands. What right or power or authority have we to declare, to divine, or control the future intentions of the American people? What right or authority have we to bind the American people or their representatives at the expiration of our terms in matters that concern their own policy, and within the sphere of their own right, and aside from contracts with other people? Let the future questions be settled, as they will be settled, by the people in authority at the time of settlement. When the people of the United States have more light, more information, know more about the Philippine Islands, their resources, their capabilities, the intentions, character, and disposition of the people, they will be much more able to determine for themselves their future intentions than we are to-day.

The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. CARMACK] has asserted that we should turn our backs upon the Philippine Islands "and sail away and never look back." Such conduct has been characterized as it properly deserves by the gentleman from Ohio. But before he does that, let me commend to the gentleman his own utterances:

> We only ask, sir, that they shall not be cast aside without mature deliberation; that this grave step shall not be taken upon the sudden and passionate impulse of the moment. We say that it should not be done until we are in possession of all the knowledge necessary to a comprehensive survey of the problem that is before us; until with conscientious care we have sifted all the arguments for and against it; until we have scrutinized and tested all its supposed advantages and weighed them in the balance against the perils, the costs, and the consequences.

But, Mr. Chairman, should it be the deliberate judgment of the people of the United States, and the desire of the people of the Philippine Islands, that we should release our claim and give to the latter independence, now is not the time to do so. In addition to the necessity of establishing some suitable and orderly form of government, there are other matters to be considered. There must be a business settlement between them and us before we part company. We must not forget that they did not achieve their own independence; they did not throw off Spanish control; they did not extinguish Spanish sovereignty; they have not released themselves in the slightest degree from the tyranny of the Spanish yoke—if that is done, it will be by the American people, not by the Filipinos. We must remember that when Dewey entered the harbor of Manila, he found the Spanish Government in full, complete control. Its authority was undisputed and opposed by none.

Aguinaldo was an exile from his native land. His followers had been defeated, betrayed, and dispersed. The last vestige of opposition to Spanish authority had been overcome. Spanish power in Manila was shattered and finally overthrown by American soldiers, American sailors, American courage, and American heroism. If remaining Spanish sovereignty is completely and wholly released from every portion of the Philippine Islands, it will be done by American valor and the expenditure of American money. If the treaty is ratified, the United States pay for the relinquishment of this sovereignty, not only the $20,000,000 provided in the treaty, but we are accepting the relinquishment of that sovereignty in lieu of millions of dollars that we were entitled to demand as expenses of the late war.

The destruction of Spanish sovereignty, the overthrow of Spanish tyranny, the termination of centuries of Spanish cruelty in the Philippine Islands will be done, not by the inhabitants, but by the valor and expenditure of blood and treasure of the people of the United States. If we should give the Philippine Islands independence, if we should release all claim upon them, justice would require that they must reimburse us the amount those liberties have cost. The people of the United States will not consent to pay out their taxes, give the use of their armies and navies, shed the blood of their sons, and make all this a present to warring, struggling bands of savages in the Philippine Islands or elsewhere.

Another question for our consideration: Should we at some future time decide to permit the people of those islands to form an independent government, we must not only remove the sovereignty of Spain, we must not under any circumstances permit them to be annexed, to become a part of or be possessed by any other foreign power. We ought to retain, and the inhabitants of the islands ought to consent for us to retain, under any circumstances, a naval and coaling station. We ought to have such treaty relations with the islands that would authorize us to intervene and prevent the interference of any foreign power or the attempt of any foreign power to establish any dominion, to exercise any authority, to take possession or control of the islands, or any portion of them, either with or without the consent of the inhabitants.

To make such treaties and such stipulations there must be organized government. It must be organized at once. It must represent the people of all the islands, as near as that can practically be done. With whom could we now make such an agreement? From the shores of islands which we possess by such good titles, and in which we possess so many rights, costing so much of blood and treasure, we must not retreat before armed enemies, nor be driven by naked savages, even if encouraged in their insolence by members of both Houses of this Congress.

But they tell us we are going to overturn our own liberties, destroy the Constitution, endanger the perpetuity of the Union, trample under foot the unbroken precedents of the nation, and "take the Stars and Stripes down from Independence Hall!" Predictions like these have been made on the eve of every acquisition of territory by the United States. They began with the acquisition of Louisiana. It was predicted on the floors of Congress that the acquisition of Louisiana "would prove a cemetery for the bodies of our citizens." Senator Plumer, of New Hampshire, contended that to—> admit this Western world into the Union would destroy at once the weight and importance of the Eastern cities, and compel them to establish a separate independent empire.

Senator White, of Delaware, declared:

> But as to Louisiana—this new, immense, unbounded world—if it should ever be incorporated into the Union, of which I have no idea, can only be done by amending the Constitution, I believe it will be the greatest curse that could at present befall us. It may be productive of innumerable evils, and especially of one that I fear to ever look upon. * * * Thus our citizens will be removed to the immense distance of two or three thousand miles from the capital of the Union, where they will scarcely ever feel the rays of the General Government. Their affections will become alienated. They will gradually begin to view us as strangers. They will form other commercial connections and our interests will become distinct. * * * And I do say that under existing circumstances, even supposing that this extent of territory was a desirable acquisition, $15,000,000 was a most enormous sum to give.

Upon the annexation of Texas these doleful predictions were repeated. Even statesmen like John Quincy Adams declared that—

> Annexation would be identical with dissolution. It would be a violation of the natural compact. * * * It would eventually result in a dissolution of the Union.

These evil predictions failed of fulfillment. Every acquisition of territory by the United States has proved a blessing, not a curse. It has added to our national resources, our national wealth, our national power, and national liberties. It is the source of our present position amongst the civilized nations of the earth. Among the gentlemen who oppose the annexation of the Philippine Islands there is not a single one who would be willing to relinquish a foot of territory that the United States has ever acquired. All of our great gold mines, our great silver mines, our most magnificent forests, great plains, teeming with the products of agriculture, have all been acquired by annexation and expansion.

One of the greatest blessings that the people of the United States possess is our expansive domain and large stretches of territory; the fact that its citizens have elbow room, room to breathe, room to move, room to build up and carry on great enterprises, and room to build homes for the people. All this is due to expansion. Expansion is not new to us. It has been the constant policy of the United States. It has been the law of our growth, the instinct of our nature. It is the tendency of our race. We could not prevent it if we would. We ought not to prevent it if we could. Why should this policy that has been fraught with so many blessings, that has brought no evil, mean destruction now? The Filipinos, indolent as all tropical people are, will be far more tractable than the American Indians, while the islands are more accessible and more easily reached now than was California at the close of the Mexican war.

Mr. Chairman, I have no sympathy with those timid souls who constantly fear and predict the overthrow of our liberties and the final collapse of our free institutions. I have more faith in the good sense, and wisdom, and patriotism of the American people, in the stability and perpetuity of our institutions and the future of our race, than to believe for one moment that our liberties, our safety, our Constitution, or our institutions depend in the slightest degree upon whether we retain or let go every foot of territory lately acquired from Spain. We may retain Porto Rico or not, we may retain the Philippine Islands or not, we may retain or release any or all of them, we may retain them now and release them hereafter, and the perpetuity and stability of our Government, of our institutions, the liberties of our people will be in no wise involved. The life, the strength, the endurance of this splendid Republic, for which valor has fought and devotion has prayed, cemented by the blood of heroes and the tears of bereavement, have stood every strain, in war and peace, and are too vital, their principles too firmly grounded in the hearts of 75,000,000 people, to be seriously affected by anything this Congress will or can do upon the question of annexation. If our final decision is right, it will be approved. If it is wrong, it will be swept aside by the onward march of a liberty-loving people.

Again we are told "this presents a serious matter to those of our fellow-citizens who live by the sweat of their brow; it means that every toiler in this country must compete with millions of Asiatic laborers, who are content with wages of less than 10 cents per day. It means reduced wages, consequently less comforts, less opportunities to the laboring masses. It means the crowding of the labor market of this country with a class of laborers far inferior to the Chinese, whom we have excluded." It is very gratifying that some of the gentlemen on that side of the House have become of late extremely interested in the welfare "of our fellow-citizens who live by the sweat of their brows." At last they are discovering that competition "with millions of Asiatic laborers who are content with wages of less than 10 cents per day" means "reduced wages," "less comforts," "less opportunities to the laboring masses" of our own country. Heretofore these gentlemen have subjected American laborers to competition with laborers who labor, with workmen who work, and work cheap; men who are able, willing, well equipped with brawn, brain, and modern implements; men who must have food, clothing, reasonable comforts of civilized life for themselves and family; men who place their products in our own markets to the exclusion of products of our own labor.

Now, these gentlemen are solicitous only to protect us from competition of laborers who do not labor, from workmen who do not work, from men who do not produce, whose only raiment is a palm leaf, whose only implement is a knife, and whose only lawful occupation is gathering bananas and cocoanuts. But this small improvement even is welcome. It is to be hoped these gentlemen will learn another lesson equally, if not more, important. They should learn that competition with cheap labor in Europe, in South America, in Mexico, in any part of the world is as injurious to American laborers as competition with Asiatic labor. They should remember that competition with what cheap labor produces, puts upon our own market, and sells in competition with like products from our own workmen, cheaper than they can produce it, is competition with cheap labor itself.

But let me call attention to the fact that during our whole history it has been as competent for the Filipinos to enter the labor markets of America as it is to-day. They were entitled to come to our shores and capable of becoming citizens of the United States. There has been nothing to detain them but their want of desire to come. The annexation of those islands will not increase their facilities, their temptations, or their desires to "crowd the labor markets of this country." When Spanish tyranny rendered their lives burdensome, when they were goaded to fury by Spanish cruelty and Spanish oppression, when unprincipled tyrants rendered their homes a hell upon earth, even these were not sufficient to drive them from their homes to American shores to "crowd the labor markets of this country." If a single Filipino ever came to labor or engage in industrial pursuits in the United States, even to escape Spanish oppression, I have never heard of it.

If they preferred their own country to ours under those circumstances, preferred to endure oppression rather than exile, will they love home and native land less when under the Stars and Stripes they are guaranteed "life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness?" Nor will their labor compete with ours by selling its products in our own market in competition with the products of our own labor. They will send us only what we can not produce in sufficient quantities to supply our own market. Attempts are being made to alarm the sugar and tobacco producers by the dread of a fearful competition. They can produce but the smallest fraction of the amount necessary to supply our own deficiencies. Of the $60,832,072 paid to foreign countries during the last fiscal year for sugar, we paid to the Philippine Islands only $381,379. Of the $10,327,479 paid for the purchase of foreign tobacco during eleven months last year, the Philippine Islands received too small a sum to be reported, if any. Their productions of these articles will doubtless increase under American control, but they can never in a hundred years supply our own deficiency. The goods they will send us will be in exchange for the products of our own labor and are those for which we now pay cash to foreign countries.

Other prophets of evil tell us that we are going "to acquire territory, not that it may be the home of a free and self-governing people, but to set it apart as 'a land accursed, a land into which the Constitution and the principles of American liberty are forbidden to enter;'" that we are going to establish over the inhabitants of the islands "a tyranny, and that a rebellion against it would be a duty and not a crime;" that the President of this Republic is endeavoring "to establish despotism in another country and to destroy the liberties of its people." What soothing effects such utterances will have upon the insurgents now threatening our soldiers at Manila! How they are pouring "oil on the troubled waters!" How they will make the Filipinos love us and our institutions! I denounce these utterances as unfounded slanders upon the American people and the American Government. If some future historian or some enemy of our country should desire to find and select the most bitter denunciations of our people and our institutions, he will find them in the newspapers and the CONGRESSIONAL RECORDS of the closing year of the nineteenth century.

No government can be established over those islands, if annexed to the United States, except with the consent of this House, of the Senate, and the President of the United States. Who has authorized you to say that a government so framed, so sanctioned, will be despotic, subversive of the liberties of the people? Who has authorized you to prophesy for the future Congress? Who has drawn such a plan of government? By what authority is it promulgated? In whose hands is its formation? What right have you to say that the representatives of the American people, men who are to be or have been elected by freemen, will impose a tyrannous government upon any people that is under their protection? Every proclamation issued by the President of the United States with reference to the government of the territories to be annexed has been a refutation of these unfounded statements.

When the needs and industries and resources of the country have been ascertained, when we have had time to acquire the necessary information, it is safe to trust the representatives of the American people to establish a government in the Philippine Islands, not only much better than the people have ever known, but one that will give the fullest share of personal liberty and political privileges that the people are capable of receiving consistent with their own welfare and happiness and the honor of our country.

We are pointed to the example of Spain in proof of the evil effects of extended territories. Why compare America to Spain, Americans to Spaniards? The difference between these two races was demonstrated by Dewey at Manila, by Sampson and Schley at Santiago, by Shafter and Wheeler and their magnificent soldiers at San Juan Hill.

Why not rather point us to our own race, to the example of our own history? Why cite us to a nation that has failed in all she has ever undertaken? Why not hold before us rather the example of that race which since the commencement of the fifteenth century has increased the area of its dominion from 125,000 square miles to 15,050,000 square miles and the people protected under its flags from 4,000,000 to 475,000,000, and who now govern and control nearly one-third of the earth's surface and one-third of its population? In the face of the success of our own previous policy of expansion, as well as the success of English colonial government, it is un-American, unpatriotic to say "can't." We can. We can do what any other people can do. Everything is possible to Americans that is possible to any other race or nation. We have met every crisis in our history successfully. The American people have surmounted every difficulty in their paths, they have proved equal to every burden, to every duty imposed upon them, in war or in peace, in science or in literature, or civil government. We have filled every ideal, and there are none to claim superiority over us.

Objections are raised that the annexation of the Philippine Islands will require a large standing army. I confess to some misgivings as to the propriety of the full increase of the Army provided for in this bill. I am not devotedly attached to a large standing army in time of peace. But it is singular that so many of the objections are urged only against the annexation of the Philippine Islands and none against the annexation of Porto Rico or the preservation of peace and order in Cuba. We hear nothing about the "consent of the governed," the "establishment of tyranny," or the "overthrow of the liberties" of the people in Porto Rico. The expense of the increase of the Army made necessary by annexation of outlying territories or preservation of peace in Cuba may well be borne by those territories. But the large increase of the Army provided for in this bill is not made necessary by the annexation of the Philippine Islands.

If some of the utterances to which we have been listening of late had been unsaid, the army needed in the Philippines would have been less in numbers and for a shorter duration. But we have not forgotten the lessons of the late war. We remember too vividly the defenseless condition in which the opening of hostilities found us. Had our enemy been a nation well prepared with an army and navy equipped and ready for action, defeat, disaster, and national humiliation at the beginning of hostilities would have undoubtedly overtaken us. We were extremely fortunate in having for an enemy a nation as unprepared as ourselves and one willing to wait until we were ready to open hostilities. But the safety and honor of the nation require that no future national difficulties in which we may become involved should find us in a like condition of unpreparedness. The position of a nation among other nations of the earth, its peace and security, are determined by the strength of its arm, the number and size of its cannon, the strength and swiftness of its battle ships, and the quality of the men it is prepared to place behind its guns. I want to see an army of such size—and of such size only—as is necessary for the national honor and national defense and the national safety.

We are told the Philippine Islands possess no trade. The same could have been said successfully, much more successfully, and with much more truth, of every Territory ever acquired by the United States, except Hawa i. As well compare the productions of gold in Colorado and California, the wheat productions of the Dakotas, the corn productions of Iowa and Nebraska, now and at the time of their annexation as compare the trade of the Philippine Islands now under the Spanish flag with what it will be under the Stars and Stripes.

But, Mr. Chairman, the trade of the Philippine Islands, while even now it is something worth acquiring and will be much expanded and increased in value through annexation by the United States, is only one part, an exceedingly small and insignificant part, of the future trade and commerce that the annexation of these islands will help us to acquire. The productions of the United States are increasing year by year with tremendous rapidity and are assuming unheard-of proportions. The end is not yet. There is room for vast development all over the United States, East and West, North and South. Why, Mr. Chairman, if I take the train at Washington City and ride to New York, I pass in the vicinity of cities containing six to eight millions of people. Taking the train at my own home, and passing a like distance through a country more fertile, with far richer soil, much healthier in climate, with brighter skies, with infinitely greater natural resources, I pass in the vicinity of towns containing 30,000 inhabitants.

That is the difference between the East and the West. There will come a time when this difference will grow constantly less, until it will cease to exist. The opportunities for development in the West are beyond description. Its future growth and development none can foretell. But when the people of the West have attained full growth, developed all their resources, extended and expanded their industries, what is to become of our surplus productions? Where will our purchasers be? To whom shall we sell them? In the past we have depended almost wholly upon England and her colonies for our markets. Should their demands continue, which is improbable, our productions are far exceeding their needs.

Somewhere we must obtain new markets, somewhere new outlets for our productions. The only remaining field is in Asiatic countries. There are over 500,000,000 people who are just awakening from the lethargy of ages. They are just beginning to feel their wants, realize their powers. They are just beginning the development of their own resources. Their purchases now exceed $1,066,000,000 annually and are upon the constant increase. Their purchases from us have doubled in two years. They are just beginning to eat the food and wear the clothing of civilized people. As that development increases their wants will increase, their trade and commerce will increase, and it is important—extremely important—that we should be prepared to take hold and defend our share of it. No other power must be permitted to close those ports to our commerce. This will be our most natural sphere. There we enjoy advantages possessed by no great rival. Over the Pacific Ocean we are far nearer to the principal ports of eastern Asia and Oceanica than any European nation. From Hongkong to San Francisco is 6,380 miles and but little more to Portland and Puget Sound ports; the average distance from western European ports is 9,900 miles. From San Francisco to Shanghai is 5,400 miles; the average from English and German ports to Shanghai is 10,600 miles. From Yokohama to San Francisco is 4,790 miles; the average from European ports is 11,250 miles. In our trade on the Atlantic we are at a disadvantage with all our competitors. In our trade on the Pacific the advantages are all with us. There is where we must strike for future trade and future commerce, and we must be prepared to protect it. It is as much our duty to protect the business as the property of our citizens.

The gentleman from Indiana on yesterday told us that commerce is the child of peace. Not in the Orient. What would become of the commerce of Great Britain in Asia and Africa but for British tars, British cannon, and British battle ships? The kind of peace that begets commerce in that part of the world is the peace for the maintenance of which you are prepared to fight and fight hard. We can preserve and increase our trade and commerce in the Orient if we are prepared to defend them. If we hesitate or falter, they are lost. With a chain of naval stations in Hawaii, the Ladrones, and the Philippine Islands, the Pacific Ocean will become an American lake, and will bear American commerce, not only now, but in the future, when the cities of the West rival the great cities of the East and when the commerce upon the Pacific equals that upon the Atlantic Ocean.

If we lose the opportunity to secure these stations now, it may never occur again. There has been no period since the birth of the American Republic when it would have been possible in any manner, by conquest or by peaceful methods, to secure in an honorable way a good title to the islands to be acquired by the treaty with Spain. If not acquired now, there may never again in all our history occur a like opportunity. The excellent lines of ex-Senator Ingalls contain a warning:

OPPORTUNITY.

Master of human destinies am I!
Fame, love, and fortune on my footsteps wait;
Cities and fields I walk; I penetrate
Deserts and seas remote, and passing by Hovel and mart and palace—soon or late
I knock unbidden once at every gate!
If sleeping, wake; if feasting, rise before
I turn away. It is the hour of fate,
And they who follow me reach every state
Mortals desire, and conquer every foe
Save death; but those who doubt or hesitate,
Condemned to failure, penury, and woe,
Seek me in vain, and uselessly implore.
I answer not, and I return no more!

Our national opportunity is here! It is at our very doors! It is knocking at our gate! It is upon the threshold of the Capitol! It is the hour of our fate! Let us awake, arise before it turns away, open wide our portals, welcome the coming guest, and follow the paths in which it leads, lest it pass by to "return no more." [Applause.]

Mr. HAY. I yield fifteen minutes to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. SIMS].

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, it is not my purpose to join in any unseemly criticism of the President. I am ready to concede to him the purest of motives. Ohio has given us three great Republican Presidents, and the present occupant of the White House, in my judgment, is not the least of them. As far as I am concerned, I would not exchange him for any other Republican from that great State.

But, Mr. Chairman, shall our admiration of the President prevent us from exercising our own independent judgment on questions which it is as much our duty to investigate and determine for ourselves as it is his?

I am not such a blind follower of those high in authority as to regard it as treasonable to exercise my own independent judgment in all matters coming before us without reference to what may be the opinions of the President. I applaud as much as any one the kindly utterances of our President in his recent Southern tour regarding the graves of the Confederate dead. But shall I, on that account, say that because our flag, in time of war, has been raised in two hemispheres it shall never be hauled down? Our flag has never yet floated over a subject people, and I hope that it never will. How long has it been since a Republican President from Ohio in effect hauled down the flag when it was used to cover despotic military rule in the States of Louisiana, South Carolina, and Florida? Our flag was made to float over the land of the free and the home of the brave. Shall it take the place of the sword of Saladin and the torch of Omar?

Since the days of childhood one warning has never ceased to reverberate in my ears: "Beware of a large standing army!" I have been taught all my life that a large standing army is the one thing most dangerous to a republic. This has been the universally expressed opinion of all the people.

It is not necessary at this time to go over in detail the elementary principles underlying and justifying our position. They are as old as our Government, and as well if not better known than any other general political doctrine. But our inquiries should rather be, What is there new in the present situation that will justify a departure?

History furnishes no example of a nation in either ancient or modern times that has equaled the growth and prosperity of our country. Ours is the one country on the face of the earth to which the people of all other nations do most like to come when they leave their own. It is the dream of half the youths of all other lands and countries that they may some fortunate day be able to make their homes in America and share the great blessing of our free and independent institutions. Then why should we change our fundamental principles and turn back, as it were, to the usages and customs of the Old World, to escape which our forefathers underwent the hardships of pioneer life in the New World?

Large standing armies have been the curse of the Old World. Why invite it to our shores?

Mr. Chairman, it is a strange contemplation to me that we are asked to increase our Army at a moment when all Europe is suffering from conditions brought on by large standing armies and at an hour when we are invited to attend a peace parliament of the world; at a time when one of the most warlike of all modern nations, one of the most successful of European powers, one of the greatest and most aggressive nations of the earth, the one having the greatest number of trained soldiers, invites all Christendom to join her in a universal peace movement. In her benign and Christian effort to reduce all the armies of all the earth, we stand forth solitary and alone in our action looking to a great increase of our standing Army. While the Old World is trying to lay down the sword we seek to take it up. While they are trying to quit the fields of blood and carnage we turn our face the other way. While the Old World powers are striving for universal disarmament we propose to increase our standing Army in time of peace by 400 per cent.

Why should we for one moment seriously consider such a proposition? What are our necessities? Does any foreign power threaten our shores? Are we in new dangers threatening us from internal sources? The answer is emphatically no. Then why increase our Army? Simply to enable our Government to carry out a policy as antagonistic to the principles and doctrines of our Constitution and Declaration of Independence as it is possible to be conceived. To enable our Government to enter upon a course of criminal aggression and foreign conquest, exceeding the designs of the most rapacious and greedy of any European nation. Simply to place ourselves in a situation to be a party to all future European and eastern complications. Simply to enable our Government to subjugate and hold in a state of continuous subjugation many millions of people who are as much entitled to free and independent government as are the people of Cuba, for whose independence and freedom we have waged a successful but most expensive war.

Why should we fight to free the people of Cuba and fight the people of the Philippine Islands in order to keep them from establishing a free and independent government of their own? If we are not to fight the Filipinos in order to keep them from gaining their freedom, we do not need the large army called for in this bill. No other nation is making or threatening to make war on Cuba, Porto Rico, or the Philippines. The Filipinos are not asking us to assist them to form a government for themselves. They only ask to be let alone. They claim that if they are worthy of freedom they ought to be able to set up the institutions of that freedom. Putting behind us the temptations of conquest and gain, how are we to answer the argument of these people?

We are assured by one high in the councils of the dominant party that it is not the intention to hold these islands as a permanent colonial possession. Then why have a permanent increase in the standing Army? If ultimate independence is contemplated, what necessity is there for an increase in our military force of a permanent character? If our possession and occupation of the Philippines is to be only temporary, why not call for volunteers for this service to be held no longer than they are needed? The temporary occupation of our newly acquired territory can not be the excuse or justification of a permanent increase of the Army.

On the other hand, if our possession of the Philippines is to be permanent, and in order to be so we must keep up the large Army provided for in this bill, it is impossible to realize a revenue from them that will equal the increased expense of providing for so large an increase in the Army. Our holding the islands must result in an inevitable loss to our Government, while it may be beneficial to many men as individuals. It may result ultimately as a benefit to the people of those islands. But, Mr. Chairman, are we to go on increasing the burdens of our citizens as taxpayers that, forsooth, we may be of ultimate benefit to those strange and unknown people who are now getting ready to fight us in order to keep from accepting our beneficence?

Our present standing army on a peace footing does not cost us exceeding $25,000,000 a year. With the increase contemplated it will not cost the taxpayers of this country less than $100,000,000 a year. Then there will be a large increase growing out of the added expense to the War Department in the way of additional clerk hire and other outlay due to increased work on account of this increase in the Army, also to an increase of the pension list and to a large increase due to the increased retirement list. It is now the custom before retiring an Army officer to promote him. He then retires on three-fourths of full pay in this higher rank, which usually is about equal to the full pay of the rank from which he has just been promoted.

In this way the retired officer is virtually pensioned for life at full pay of the rank he held while in the actual service of the Government. When we sum up all these expenses, direct and indirect, due to this proposed increase of our standing Army, we will have added to our annual expenses not less than $100,000,000. Where is this money to come from? Are we going to tax the Filipinos, the Porto Ricans, and the Cubans to raise this enormous sum to be used in holding them in subjection? If so, what benefit will it be to them to have been freed from the Spanish yoke of like oppression? Is it possible to realize so large a sum from the resources of these countries after providing for their local wants? Will the friends of this measure be willing to make it a part of this bill that the expenses of all troops and war material used by the United States in any of these islands are to be paid out of the revenues of the islands?

The American people are willing to stand any tax that may be needed for humane and Christian purposes, but they are the last people on this earth to submit to an unjust tax or one to be used for unjust and inhuman purposes. [Applause.]

Already there is much complaint at the burden and inconvenience of our internal war taxes, while yet the war is hardly over. I ask, Mr. Chairman, what will be the storm of denunciation of this tax when it is continued indefinitely in order to keep up a large standing army in these newly acquired territories against their will and over their protest and armed opposition? No party can hope to retain control of this Government that advocates the continuance of a direct tax for purposes not approved by the people.

Our Navy is to be vastly increased, and our additional annual expenses on this account will run into the millions. Our civil expenses will also be vastly increased, by reasons of changes made necessary by the war. I again pause to ask, From what source is the money to be realized? Imports are falling off every year. We can not hope to increase our revenues from tariff taxes under the present prohibitory protective laws. The present tariff, as a revenue producer, is a lamentable failure, which will be only the more clearly demonstrated as the years go by. If our expenses are to be increased, this increase must come out of the direct taxpayer. When taxes are so collected, their burden is seen and felt by the people, and they will not submit to any taxation that does not appear to be an imperative public necessity.

We have just passed a bill reported by the Committee on Naval Affairs, called by the innocent name of the personnel bill, that increases the expenses of our Government $600,000 per annum, to be continued, as far as I can see, for all time to come. It seems that since the war some of our friends have so grown and expanded that they are unable longer to think or consider the poor taxpayer. I wish to call your attention to the fact that the apparently forgotten taxpayer does a large share of the voting, and if he has no voice here he will have one in future elections, and my opinion is that when his voice is heard again many voices heard here now will be heard here no more forever. When the taxpayer sees that his patriotism is imposed on, and that a just war waged in the name of humanity is made the excuse to pile up his burdens unnecessarily, he will be heard from in thunder tones.

I know a great deal is being said about the great balance of trade in our favor during the last year, and I am glad that it is true; but do not forget that this increase in our balance of trade is due in a large part to the reduction of imports. We do not collect revenue on exports, however large they may be. Revenue comes from imports, and when imports decrease, revenue decreases. This large and favorable balance of trade, in so far as it is due to increased exports, does not bring one cent of revenue into the Treasury of our nation.

Our pension burden in round numbers is now about $145,000,000. This amount must be augmented to some extent by the results of our late war with Spain. I think that we may reasonably expect the annual pension appropriation to reach $150,000,000 within five years from this time. If we increase our Regular Army and our Navy we must expect an increase in pensions proportionately.

Add to the present pension appropriation $150,000,000 for this standing Army, as provided in this bill, and we have an annual burden of $300,000,000 in these two items as war expenses. Then add to this annual war burden $600,000 per annum, the accruing interest on the $200,000,000 of bonds issued in aid of the late war with Spain, and we have the enormous annual expense of $300,600,000, to be raised by taxation on the people, besides the $200,000,000 of principal of these bonds to be paid when due.

Besides this, we must add the annual accruing interest on all other outstanding bonds issued for war purposes, amounting to $29,896,023.20 per annum, before we know what our annual expenses are for war purposes. Then add to this the principal of unpaid bonds issued on account of the war between the States, amounting to $747,400,580, and we begin to see what the people have to pay on account of wars that have been, without adding anything for wars that we will certainly have with increased frequency when our possessions cover half the globe.

Under our system of taxation, both direct and indirect, all this vast sum must be raised by taxing consumption and current business transactions. Not a dollar is to be levied or collected from realized wealth. If the treaty is ratified without amendment we must pay $20,000,000 to Spain. Now, I have only referred to expenses and debts of the Government due alone to wars and on account of wars. Besides all this vast sum the current expenses of the Government must be paid, which as the country grows and population increases must necessarily increase in amount.

Had we not better stop and consider where all this vast sum of money is to come from before we create the necessity for it? Is this not a surprising condition for the heretofore most peaceful nation on the earth? How unfavorably do we contrast with those nations of the Old World who, after having tried this course for centuries and finding their people no longer able to stand up under the burdens of great standing armies, invite us to join them in universal disarmament. I am told, too, that the President proposes that we take part in that great first movement toward the millennium and encourage all nations to join hands in this blessed effort to secure and maintain universal peace. Then what a sad reflection on the sincerity of our President, that we are asked to vote for this bill increasing our standing Army fourfold and our war expenses 400 per cent.

I want to warn our friends in the possession of great wealth that such legislation as this is driving us in the direction of an income tax as fast as the wheels of time can carry us. No doubtful decision of a divided court will serve longer to satisfy the people in their demand for this most just of all species of taxation. The people can make or amend constitutions, and will certainly do so where its provisions are so construed as to shield those most able to bear the burdens of government from a just and due proportion thereof.

There is another branch of this subject to which I wish to invite the attention of the House, and that is the increased political power that the Army will have when it is increased fourfold. There is no way to maintain the supremacy of the civil over the military power in this country except by keeping the Regular Army down to a comparatively small force in time of peace. I saw passed in this House, by reason of the favor of many and the fear of others, a bill to permit the volunteer soldiers to vote for Congressmen wherever the soldiers might be stationed on the day of election.

There is no reason why the elective franchise should not be given to the soldiers of the Regular Army, if the soldiers of the Volunteer Army are to have it. The same reasons why the one should or should not vote applies with equal force to the other. Give us an army of 100,000 men, under the direct command and control of the President, and place the ballot in their hands, and you will, in my humble judgment, never defeat the party in power in any election that may hereafter be held. Should the ballot not be given the soldiers of the Regular Army, they have friends and relations who are voters and on whom they exert a most powerful influence. It would not be unreasonable for each soldier and officer in the Regular Army to influence as many as 10 votes.

With 100,000 men in the Regular Army, 1,000,000 votes may be controlled by them. With their chances of promotion all in the hands of the President as their Commander in Chief, how natural it will be for the officers and soldiers of the Army to see that their interest lies in the success of the party in power. The greater the Army the greater the inducement and temptation to use their influence. Virtual military rule in this country can be escaped only by keeping the military influence down to the minimum. I hope ours will never become a French republic. We do not need a large or even increased standing army unless we create or bring about conditions calling for it.

The total imports into the Philippine Islands from all the world for the year 1896 were $28,815,075, of which the United States contributed $162,446, or 5.5 per cent. The total exports for the same year were $33,481,484—$4,982,857 of which came to the United States, or 14.9 per cent. The total imports and exports for that year were $62,296,559. Is it reasonable to suppose that we will at once very greatly increase our trade with these islands?

Suppose that all the trade of the Philippines follows our flag at once. All the exports and imports combined in value would not exceed the cost to us of the army and navy that we would have to keep there. If we could get all the trade of the Philippines, which is an impossibility, we would be benefited only to the extent of the profits of the business, both direct and indirect, which can hardly exceed 10 per cent on the volume handled, which would be only about $6,000,000 in the combined volume of both imports and exports.

Another thing to be considered is that the profits of trade go to corporations and individuals engaged in the business, whereas taxes are collected off all citizens subject to taxation, whether they are or are not engaged in any particular business. Is it right, is it just, to tax the people of the United States in a gross sum exceeding $50,000,000 per annum in order that some of the citizens of the United States, on increasing their trade with the people of the Philippines, may realize a profit of not exceeding $5,000,000 per annum?

Suppose we are all ardent expansionists, is it not good statesmanship to consider in detail the circumstances and possibilities of benefits to result in each proposed instance of expansion, and if the difficulties and expenses attending the exercise of sovereignty and control over any particular country exceeds any possible benefits to be derived from such a country, is it not good judgment to refuse to take control of such country? From the standpoint of an ardent expansionist I can not see how it is advisable to take the Philippines.

I do not see how we can in the exercise of a good conscience take forcible control of those islands against the wish and will of those people and then tax them in order to furnish the means with which to perpetuate that control. From the devastated condition of the islands I have no doubt that it will require all the revenue their people are able to pay for many years to repair and build up the waste places left as the result of war, and the expense of keeping our Army and Navy there will have to be paid by the people of the United States for many years to come, and that it is not possible under any conceivable circumstances that the United States will ever directly or indirectly be reimbursed for the vast sums she will have to expend on this account. The only way I see to prevent it is to either modify the treaty or to give the islands their freedom.

I think patriotism, like charity, should begin at home. I think we should first consider what is best for our own people before we rush into sources of untold expense either to promote the private enterprises of our own citizens or to benefit the condition of foreigners.

It seems to me that we should confine our acquisition of territory to the Western Hemisphere. If we dominate and control half the globe, is not that enough? But under no circumstances do I favor the forcible annexation of any country whose people are struggling for freedom and independence, without their consent freely and voluntarily expressed. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. HULL. I yield ten minutes to the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. STEWART].

Mr. STEWART of New Jersey. Mr. Chairman, in the consideration of the pending bill for the increase and reorganization of our Army much extraneous matter of a sensational nature has been obtruded in the discussion.

Gentlemen cry "Imperialism!" and "Expansion!" and wave in our faces the imperial purple of the degenerate Cæsars, and pretend to believe that this nation, the asylum of the oppressed and haven of freedom, has entered on a new policy of tyranny and repression of freedom and independence in the Philippine Archipelago.

In the subjugation of Spain destiny fixed one of the great arms of the Spanish fleet in Manila Bay. Dewey was forced to follow and destroy it there, and through the unforeseen exigencies of war the Filipinos were thrown upon us as a sacred trust to protect and defend.

We would stultify our position did we do otherwise. The Filipinos require at our hands the same treatment, the same high humanity that we accord to Cuba.

The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. JOHNSON] declaims that the people of Spain are in sackcloth and ashes, their fleets at the bottom of the seas, and that they are unable, if they were so disposed, to further molest the Philippines.

If I have read history aright, I am informed that Spanish fleets have been destroyed before in many seas, and these calamities have not cured Spain of her desire to oppress and plunder.

Spain will arise again with gloomy and baleful face and bloodshot eyes to ravage and to murder.

Had the fleet been at the Canaries or the Carolines, the Philippine question would not vex or trouble us to-day, and Spain doubtless would now control them as she does the Canaries and Caroline Islands.

Our solemnly declared policy with reference to Cuba to leave her to herself when a stable government is established would seem to furnish strong presumptive evidence that the same policy will guide us with reference to the Philippines. The Government has never declared it to be its intention to permanently annex these islands; indeed, our policy points to the opposite intention.

Reference has been made to the extempore speeches of the President on his late Southern trip as to the hauling down of the American flag. No gentleman will pretend that the President meant other than that no hostile hand should haul it down. We ourselves hauled it down in Havana when it was prematurely raised, and we are committed to the policy of hauling it down in Cuba when a stable government is established. We hauled it down in Mexico when good sense and good statesmanship suggested the wisdom of the act.

But while the Government and Administration is engaged in the solution of a complex question with reference to the Philippines, requiring much further data and information than we now possess, the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. JOHNSON] insists upon looking over the shoulder of the Administration and demanding an immediate solution. He insists that the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. DOLLIVER] shall answer categorically what the definite intention of the Administration is with regard to the future of these islands.

We submit that the problem is still unsolved, and he should be content with the answer that in the opinion of this side of the House no definite intention now exists to forcibly and permanently annex the Philippine Islands.

These islands came to our charge through the bloody issue of war. We entered that war for humanity's sake, and we will hold the Philippines by the same tenure. Call it a protectorate or what you may for humanity's sake until they can be exploited among the nations of the earth with the blessings of a free and stable government of their own.

I firmly believe that the United States will never coerce those islands or Cuba against their will to share the fortunes and destiny of the mightiest, richest, and freest nation on earth.

Again, the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. JOHNSON], from the fact that we propose to increase our Army to 100,000 men, draws the unwarrantable conclusion that we must intend to use it to subjugate and tyrannize over the Philippines.

Our flag waves now and forever over Hawaii and Porto Rico, and, in the nature of things, must glorify Cuba and the Philippines for an indefinite term in the future. Can it reasonably be said that in view of this vast acquisition of territory, both permanent and temporary, a standing army of 100,000 regular soldiers to environ our volunteers in case of war and form the first fighting line is excessive? Surely not. The only fear is that it may prove too small.

What American really fears that the most ardent devotees of freedom, the fearless champions of independence, will lend aid or countenance to oppression and tyranny? We risked our national integrity and honor, the lives and fortunes of our people, in the uncertain issues of a foreign war to save a neighboring people from the cruel oppression and injustice of vindictive Spain.

Unselfishly we demanded justice of Spain for the suffering and distracted people of Cuba, and patiently waited while the bloody work of Weyler went on, and not until our glorious ship Maine with her immortal crew went down in the darkling waters of Havana Harbor by the explosion of a submarine mine, while ostensibly under the protection and hospitality of Spain, did we raise the menacing arm of war, not for punishment, retribution, or conquest, but that a neighboring people might be freed from the unbearable cruelties and tyranny of Spain. [Loud applause.] Such is the unselfish part that the United States has played in this great tragedy.

Such national characteristics can not be changed in a day. The traits that have made us peculiar among the nations of the earth from the beginning will abide with us to the end.

The morning twilight of our national existence found our forefathers willing to sacrifice their "lives, their fortunes, and their sacred honor" in the holy cause of freedom and independence, and when the evening twilight arrives in the gloaming of our fading selves we will still exhort high Heaven that freedom and independence shall not depart with us from off the earth. [Loud applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. HULL. Mr. Chairman; before I move that the committee rise, I desire to state that the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MARSH] will control the time on this side at the evening session.

Mr. HAY. I want to state that the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. JETT] will control the time on this side.

Mr. HULL. I move that the committee rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. PAYNE, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill H. R. 11022, and had come to no resolution thereon.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

Mr. HAGER, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled bills of the following titles; when the Speaker signed the same:

H. R. 10459. An act to amend section 5 of the act approved June 10, 1880, governing the immediate transportation of dutiable goods without appraisement; and

H. R. 8882. An act for the reestablishment and reconstruction of a light-house at or near the mouth of Salem Creek, New Jersey.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS.

By unanimous consent, Mr. KERR obtained leave to withdraw from the files of the House, without leaving copies, papers in the case of George W. Harbough, Fifty-fifth Congress, no adverse report having been made thereon.

Mr. HULL. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now take a recess until 8 o'clock.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER appointed Mr. CONNOLLY to act as Speaker pro tempore.

And accordingly (at 5 o'clock p. m.) the House was declared in recess until 8 p. m.

EVENING SESSION.

The recess having expired, the House (at 8 o'clock p. m.) was called to order by Mr. CONNOLLY as Speaker pro tempore.

ARMY REORGANIZATION BILL.

On motion of Mr. MARSH, the House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 11022) for the reorganization of the Army, and for other purposes, with Mr. LACEY in the chair.

Mr. MARSH. I yield to the gentleman from New Hampshire [Mr. SULLOWAY] such time as he desires.

Mr. SULLOWAY. Mr. Chairman, I am earnestly supporting this measure to increase the Regular Army and authorize the Commander in Chief to recruit it, if need be, to 100,000 men, and shall favor the most liberal appropriations to increase our Navy. I am for maintaining the gold standard, the only standard of intelligence and of the commercial nations of the world, and I am also in favor of maintaining an army and navy sufficiently large and powerful to protect and defend our citizens and their property at home and abroad. I am for annexation as territory of the United States every grain of sand (the fruit of victories won by our sailors and soldiers on sea and land) that Spain has ceded to us by the terms of the pending treaty. I believe duty demands this to save the Filipinos (who are our wards as the result of war) from anarchy and to protect them against adventurers and tyrants. There are now in the service at least 75,000 men who, by the terms of their enlistment, will be entitled to be discharged the minute the pending treaty is ratified and the war now pending between this country and Spain is at an end. These good citizens and patriotic men, who abandoned their business and families to take part in the shooting match, are now held to service, and each day's delay to ratify the treaty and pass this bill causes many of them irreparable loss. This measure, if enacted into law, will enable President McKinley to further recruit the Regular Army and discharge the patriotic and heroic volunteers, who did not, when they enlisted, expect to be held to do garrison duty.

Our Navy should be second to none. I hope, trust, and expect to see our merchant marine the equal of that of any other nation. It will be if the American Congress in its wisdom shall so legislate that our commerce upon the seas can be carried in American bottoms, under our flag, instead of paying to aliens, as we are now doing, $200,000,000 annually to transport that which we sell and buy. We pay to aliens $500,000 for freight every day in the year—fifty millions more than we appropriate, and nearly sixty millions more than we pay in pensions. What a princely portion of this $200,000,000 would go into the hands and pockets of our laborers and seamen if we would legislate to put this business under our flag and into the hands of Americans, as I believe duty demands of us. With that commerce we must have a great navy to police the seas in time of peace and protect our commerce in war; for wars ever have been and must of necessity ever continue to be.

Not until human nature is annihilated will war cease to be, and it is the part of wisdom, as I believe, to accept what is inevitable and be prepared to meet conditions that must confront us in the future. Men talk of peace perpetual, arbitration for settlement of international disputes—a theory beautiful to contemplate—but it is only a delusion, a deceptive snare by which this people in their power and wisdom ought not to be caught. It pleases some to advise the beating of our swords into plowshares. If we are deluded into such action, some other people will beat their swords into our heads and take from us or destroy what we possess. I do not doubt the sincerity of purpose of those who contend for arbitration for the settlement of international disputes, but I am opposed to this Government adopting what they contend for—first, for the reason that any treaty, contract, or agreement entered into by and between nations for that purpose would be in binding effect only as a rope of sand.

The mighty will and wish of a great people, in their sovereign right, can not be chained and bound by written law or treaties. When millions of men are ready to rush to arms and die, if need be, for a cause in which they believe honor and duty demand the sacrifice, he who thinks a written constitution or a treaty would restrain them ought to have had the privilege of reading the riot act at Antietam, Shiloh, Gettysburg, or the Wilderness to convince him that such a notion was and is a delusion. For one I do not want international arbitration when the issue involves the rights of this nation or the rights of the humblest citizen thereof whom it is the duty of the nation to defend. I do not want as a board of referees, as a court of final jurisdiction, the boy King of Spain, the Sultan of Turkey, and the Shah of Persia, or any other kings or czars. I do not think they are free from prejudice toward our form of government and us as a people. We have got on quite well in the old way, from Bunker Hill to San Juan Hill on land, and have never had very serious trouble at sea.

When diplomacy fails and duty compels this people to submit no longer to the then existing conditions, I would prefer, much prefer, to point our foe to Generals Miles, Shafter, Wheeler, Merritt, Lee, and other commanders, with one or, if need be, five million men, with arms in their hands, at their command, and to say, "There are the arbitrators selected by the United States if you wish to arbitrate on land;" and point them to Rear-Admiral Dewey, Sampson, Schley, Evans, Clark, and others of our naval heroes if they desire to arbitrate at sea. [Applause.] I should have much greater confidence in either of those tribunals and their ability to secure for this people a verdict to their liking than I should at the hands of all the crowned heads that live to-day. I believe that we are entitled, when on trial, to a jury of our peers, and the crowned heads of the Old World are not the peers of the sovereign American citizen.

The tendency is not in the direction of arbitration or disarmament, but exactly the reverse. The nations that practically govern and control the people of this planet are not disarming, but, on the contrary, without exception, are increasing their armies and navies more rapidly—and have been doing so for the last quarter of a century—than at any time in their history. The nations of continental Europe have increased their armies at least 25 per cent during that time, if not during the last decade. We have ceased to be a hermit nation, isolated from the rest of mankind. We are not among nations, as some dreamers fancy, what Robinson Crusoe was in his business relations to other individuals. We are interested in every part of the globe that has commerce or conditions such that it can be developed. With this enlarged sphere for trade we must have greater power to protect and defend our rights, and the rights of our citizens, on land and sea.

Our experience during a few months of the year just past covered our Army and Navy with glory such as was unknown to the world before; but it awakened us to a realization of what would have been our weak and defenseless condition had we been at war with a first-class power. In my judgment the people do not desire to remain longer in that condition; and it is my conviction that it is our duty as their servants to increase our Army, add battle ships to our Navy, and strengthen our fortifications along our entire coast line. I rejoice that we have before us a bill to increase the Army, and it has my hearty, enthusiastic support.

We have reached such a point in our development as a nation that from this time onward we can not expect to live within ourselves and have and enjoy that degree of prosperity which has blessed us, while our laborers, under the protective system, were enriching themselves and we were dotting our land with manufacturing establishments that now produce in abundance almost everything desirable known to man and have the capacity to produce much more than we can consume. While we shall continue to protect our toilers, we must adopt the courageous and, if you please, heroic methods essential at this time to secure to the people of this nation their share (and as much more as we can obtain by legitimate means) of the world's trade and commerce on land and sea.

A policy that fifty years ago, under then existing conditions, may have been the best possible for us as a people may not be calculated to give the best results under the present changed conditions, with all that they include, in increased facilities for agricultural productions and for manufactures, and our improved methods of transportation on land and sea, by means of which, comparatively speaking, time and distance have been to a great extent eliminated. Our 80,000,000 people, with brain and muscle the equal of that number of people anywhere, are not in their industrial and business pursuits to be confined within the narrow limits that we occupied when only half our territory was under cultivation, much of that sparsely settled: when our cities were small, and for many of our manufactured articles we depended upon alien people to supply us, and when we were, as a whole, looked at from our present condition, comparatively poor. In justice to ourselves, and from a sense of duty to those who will live after us, I am in favor of taking advantage of all means that we may rightfully and honorably employ, consistent with self-interest, to broaden our horizon of trade and annex territory that may come to us by conquest or purchase in any quarter of the globe.

In connection with this subject gentlemen are discussing—and properly, I think—the question whether it is policy and wisdom on our part to retain the territory that Spain, by the terms of the pending treaty, has ceded to us. On that question I am an ardent supporter of the treaty, believing it represents what duty and patriotism demand. There is no longer any doubt as to the wish of an overwhelming majority of this people in regard to what is termed territorial expansion. A few conservative men are not enthusiastically for it; here and there one is opposed to it; but such men are retreating, and covering their retreat by apologies. There are some who are violently opposed to such a policy; but, as a rule, there are exceptions. They are the men who were bitterly opposed to the war with Spain; and some of them, I fear, in view of the glorious results obtained, are smarting under a sense of humiliation that actuates them to oppose the Administration and refuse to accept as the fruits of victories won what Spain is willing to surrender to us.

I am an earnest supporter of the Administration and desirous that the treaty be ratified. The opponents, the men who with voice and pen would deprive this people of the fruits won by our soldiers and sailors, do not meet the issue squarely, but make violent and unwarranted statements as to what the Administration proposes to do. They indulge to an extravagant extent in the use of catchwords—"imperialism," "colonial possessions," "deprive the Filipinos of their liberty," "reduce them to vassalage." Expressions of this character are substantially the stock in trade of the opponents of annexation. What has the President said or done that warrants those who oppose annexation to use any of the catchwords or sentences quoted as if they represented his views, wishes, or purposes? I answer, nothing. Such expressions, when used by those sufficiently intelligent to know what they mean, are deliberate and wanton misrepresentations, made with a purpose to mislead, prejudice, and deceive. The use of such expressions is just the course of men smarting under disappointment and humiliation, who are unable to give substantial reasons for their actions.

Has the President, or any official representing him, ever by word or act intimated that he desired to hold and govern the territory that Spain, by the treaty as written, is to cede to us in any other manner than we have held and governed territory ever since the Constitution was adopted? I challenge his opponents to produce a scintilla of evidence to prove their assertions. Who is seeking to make this an "imperial" government in the sense they wish to have the word "imperial" understood? Who is clamoring for "colonial possessions" in the sense in which they use the term? The tender solicitude that the opponents of the President profess to have for the Filipinos, and their dislike of "imperialism," and their great desire that the Filipinos shall have liberty, is shown to be only a pretense when they insist that those people be left subjects of Imperial Spain, subject to all the barbarities Spaniards know how to inflict, or perhaps the prey of an adventurer or tyrant.

When did the Filipinos ever possess liberty that these men ask American citizens to believe President McKinley desires to deprive them of? The first ray of hope in that direction that ever flashed athwart their pathway was visible to them on that May morning when Dewey, by orders from President McKinley, entered Manila Bay, when they saw the American fleet with the starry flag, the symbol of liberty, at the masthead of every craft that formed Dewey's line of battle, advancing upon the Spanish fleet, upon Spanish forts, and Spanish power. In the thunder of Dewey's cannon they heard a voice as from Jehovah proclaiming the end of Spanish savagery, robberies, and barbarities in the Philippine Archipelago. They who saw that battle saw, as an eyewitness has described it in speaking of a shell from one of the guns in Dewey's fleet as it entered one of the enemy's ships, "It looked," he said, "as if a hogshead of hell entered her." Dewey's cannon were the first that ever thundered defiance to Spanish rule in that bay, and spoke deliverance to that people from the worst and most oppressive Government that ever cursed human beings.

The "hogsheads of hell" hurled from Dewey's guns into the Spanish ships and Spanish forts were admired by the Filipinos as messengers of deliverance and hailed by them as instruments of love and mercy. In the roar of Dewey's cannon and the fire that leaped from their mouths the Filipinos heard a voice commanding the Spaniards not only to take their yoke of cruelty off the necks of the inhabitants, but to take both their shoes and feet off those islands. [Applause.]

I belong to the political party that elected William McKinley President. That party in 1856 raised in this land the flag of liberty, on which was written, "All men are entitled to liberty who have not forfeited their rights by crime."

The people of my State are not oppressors of others; yet I sit here and listen to men who, while they pretend to be very solicitous for the liberties of the Filipinos, represent constituencies in sections of our country where within my memory the price of labor was regulated by the sale of men, women, and children at the auction block. It took rivers of blood to wipe out that damnable system of human slavery; it was an atonement that soaked the Southern soil with blood and billowed our land with graves. I do not think the men of any party in this land to-day desire to oppress or enslave any people, or that members of the Republican party are called upon to defend themselves against the charge that they favor "imperialism" and oppression. And least of all do I believe that President McKinley, who has been a chief in active service in that party for many years, who has the confidence of this people as no man since Lincoln has had it, should be asked to answer such a charge.

It is just possible that some of the opponents of annexation are smarting under the remembrance of the fact that they did not succeed in preventing war with Spain, which has proved to be the most popular war ever waged by this country, with results more glorious than were ever before achieved by our countrymen. As a sort of an apology for opposing the Administration, they shout "imperialism," "colonial possessions," etc., thereby endeavoring to set up a man of straw as a target of their own manufacturing; and then they proceed to arraign the President and his followers in thought and convictions as to what is best for the public weal, and thus seek to mislead the public. Some of these, more violent than others, take a bold stand and deny that we can acquire territory unless it is to be admitted to statehood, and others contend that we can not acquire territory except by the consent of the inhabitants thereof.

Taking these propositions in the order I have named them, I say first, that if the question were new, it would seem to me the mere definition of "sovereignty" would alone be a conclusive answer. "A sovereign State," according to the definition most commonplace and really as expressive as any, would, I think, be "a State without a superior." All governments without a superior possess "sovereignty." The United States as a State, a Government, has no superior. It can make war and peace and can acquire territory. No intelligent man questions that power. It has made war and acquired territory in the past; it has acquired territory by purchase. And to those who were emboldened to question its sovereignty in that respect the Supreme Court has said from first to last, "You are in error." The contention of the annexationist is unanswered, and must ever remain unanswered because unanswerable. That contention of the opponents of the Administration is too idle to command respect. States independent, sovereign States having no superiors, are governed by what to them seems best. They, as Judge Day said to the Spaniards at Paris (I do not quote his exact language), put into a treaty whatever as conquerors they deem best. It seems to be an idle waste of time to notice the contention of the opponents of the Administration in that respect. Let them play with their man of straw. It is a harmless bundle, and too transparent to do service as a scare crow in intelligent communities. [Applause.]

Who coined the expressions so frequently invoked by the opponents of the President, like the declaration that "in the Constitution of the United States no power is given to the Federal Government to acquire territory to be held and governed permanently as colonies." Why are such declarations made? Who is contending that we, in acquiring territory to-day, are adopting "the colonial system of other nations?" Has the President or any friend of the treaty made any such declaration, or intimated such a purpose? What difference or distinction is there in this respect between the territory we may now acquire and that acquired in 1803, when we took by purchase and treaty the Louisiana territory; in 1819, when we acquired Florida; in 1848, when we conquered vast territorial possessions from Mexico; in 1853, when we acquired the "Gadsden purchase," and in 1867, when we purchased Alaska? In 1898 we annexed by law the Hawaiian Islands. Oregon we acquired by exploration, discovery, and settlement. The last-named territory was discovered by Gray in 1792, explored by Lewis and Clark in 1805, and colonized in 1811 by what is known as the Astor Settlement. We have acquired territory by purchase, by conquest, by discovery, and by operation of law.

Our power as a sovereign State in this respect can not be limited. The decisions of our courts and the policy the nation has pursued for nearly a century establish the fact that the Government of the United States has the inherent power, as fully and comprehensively as any Government on the face of the earth can have it, to acquire territory either by treaty, conquest, purchase, or by exploration and discovery; and there has never been a judicial opinion that I am able to find, or any intimation or insinuation, that we have only the right to acquire territory that we will immediately admit to statehood. That contention is new, and when confronted by the decisions of our courts, the long line of precedents, the manner in which for almost a century we have been acquiring and governing territory thus acquired, makes but feeble impression upon the minds of this people. It looks to be only an apology for opposition. We are asked, "What right has the Government of the United States to control by military force territory that we thus acquire through conquest as the result of war?" I answer, the same right that we have exercised without exception when we have acquired territory in any manner.

There seems to be in the minds of those who thus oppose the pending treaty a fear of the military arm of the Government. Generally speaking (there are some exceptions), these individuals were opposed to using the military arm of the Government against Spain in 1898. They talked and wrote of the horrors of war, told us "the mailed hand" of the Government would be laid on the shoulder of the mother's darling boy and he would be carried by force to a foreign land to suffer and die. They pictured the widows with brows craped in mourning for husbands slain, and orphans on bended knees with uplifted hands and closed eyes, piteously imploring the God of mercy to remember them in their forlorn condition. Such scenes no longer haunt them in dreams or imagination. We are at war with Spain to-day, and if the treaty, the ratification of which they seek to defeat, is not adopted, hostilities will be resumed. There will be new-made graves and weeds of mourning in fact rather than in imagination.

There are more than 75,000 men in the regular and volunteer forces of the Government who want to be discharged from the service, and are entitled to be the minute the war is ended by a treaty of peace. These are kept in the service by the opponents of the treaty and the opponents of the measure now under consideration. Every tear that moistens an eye, every sigh that comes from a heart pained by grief, because of the forced retention of these men in the service, is chargeable directly to the opponents of the treaty and the opponents of the bill under consideration. [Applause.] I want this bill passed; I want the treaty ratified.

To their second proposition, that we can not acquire territory without the consent of the inhabitants thereon, I would suggest that this proposition is, if possible, more ridiculous than the first, and to make it cover all their contentions I will add "and unless those inhabitants speak the English language." Early in our history the then President and Secretary of State said to Spain: "We will pay you so much for Florida or take it by force of arms." I do not quote the diplomatic language used. Who in Florida then spoke the English language; the Spaniards, the Indians, or the crocodiles? None of them. There was not an English publication in Florida that I am aware of possessed by a permanent resident of that Territory. Did the Spaniards desire to be annexed? No! Did the Indians? No! Did the crocodiles? I do not know. Spain concluded to sell, and ceded the territory. In our sovereignty we then possessed it, held it, and at our own sweet will governed and controlled it as seemed best to our own people.

Prior to this we purchased the territory then known as Louisiana—a territory imperial in magnitude. Did we inquire what language the inhabitants spoke and whether they desired to be annexed? No! It was known that but a comparatively few spoke our language. The sovereign state of France ceded that territory to the sovereign state known as the United States of America, and we possessed it and our sovereignty extended over it. It is true that some opposed the annexation of Florida and of the territory acquired from France, and gave as reasons what the opponents of annexation repeat to-day. Daniel Webster, great as he was, proposed, it is said, to exchange that vast domain for the right to catch codfish off the coast of Newfoundland. This is a good illustration of how the prejudice and sentiment of a locality may mislead great men. Mr. Webster's constituents were much interested in the fishing industry.

Later we went to war with Mexico, and by conquest and purchase we acquired another empire territorially. Did we inquire what language they who lived on it spoke? No; we knew that, as in the other cases named, the language was Spanish and Indian. Did we ask the consent of the inhabitants to become citizens of this country? No. We spread over Florida, the Louisiana purchase, and the territory acquired from Mexico our sovereignty and commanded the inhabitants thereof to respect and obey the authority of the United States; and when, as in each case, some persons refused to submit, we sent the Army and compelled them to obey. We made quiet, permanent settlers of them with bullets or with a rope around the neck of those it was deemed best to hang for effect on others. Have any of the opponents of the Administration and the treaty discovered any dangerous ruptures in our Constitution produced by our conduct toward the people of those territories, a fracture of any of its limbs, or seen any evidence of contusion of any of its parts? Will they to-day contend that those who opposed the acquisition of either of the territories named were wise and that the acquisition was a mistake or a misfortune to the people of the United States or the inhabitants of the territories?

"But," says one, "I contend that we can not acquire and hold territory unless we admit it to statehood." How do you know? Who authorized you to limit the power of a sovereign State? Who shall say when any territory belonging to the United States and the people living thereon shall be admitted to statehood? Congress, not you or I. It is half a century since we acquired from Mexico the territory mentioned. We have held a considerable part of it for that length of time and not given it statehood. It is claimed that there are 400,000 people in the Territory of Oklahoma—as many as in New Hampshire. They have not statehood. They will not have until Congress grants it. What becomes of your scarecrow pretense that we can not acquire and hold territory if the wisdom of the powers that be sees fit to do so?

We have done it for at least half a century in the case named, and are continuing to do so. Has the Constitution sprung a leak by so doing? Did you feel damp and complain until Dewey at Manila won for us a victory, matchless in the annals of warfare, and an empire territorially which as a base of operations will afford us opportunity to extend our commerce and dispose of our manufactured products in the East, where live 400,000,000 people whose trade every nation is struggling to secure—trade that must be worth to us many billions? And this was done in pursuance of orders from the President in waging a war that you opposed; and you are to-day opposed to retaining the fruits of our victories on land and sea. Why this tender solicitude of yours as to the Filipinos, the Cubans, and the Porto Ricans, when for half a century you have been as dumb as an oyster as to the oppression of those who live on territory we now possess?

The motive of this opposition to the Administration is transparent. The real reason is patent—opposition to war with Spain. This Government can acquire territory and hold it as such at home or abroad at its own good will. It can admit to statehood as seems best for the public weal. The contention of our opponents in this respect is unworthy of consideration. As to what policy should be pursued in governing territory at home or abroad, that will always be a question open for discussion and difference of opinion; but the right to acquire territory is a right inherent in a sovereign State. If by conquest we captured the Bermudas, or by purchase acquired them, does anyone think we could not hold them unless we gave them statehood? I, for one, wish we possessed them.

It is not the Constitution that prevents our possessing them. It is the sovereign State of Great Britain. And yet the contention of the opponents of the treaty and of annexation would prohibit our acquiring them for the reason that their population would not entitle them to statehood. If we engage in war with a foreign power and as an incident acquire territory by conquest as compensation, or for the protection of our commerce, or the safety and general welfare of our people, I deny that fitness for statehood is an essential condition precedent to such acquisition by us. I have frequently thought, as I have listened to speeches from gentlemen in this House opposed to annexation, gentlemen who deny the power of the Government to acquire territory except it be immediately admitted to statehood, that one who failed to hear the text announced but heard the argument and the citation of authorities would think that the gentlemen were arguing a flowage case to a jury and struggling to confuse them by citing the decisions of some court as to the rights of riparian owners.

We are asked, "What right has the Government of the United States to control by military force and power territory that we acquire through conquest and as a result of war?" That question was raised and distinctly settled in the case of Cross vs. Harrison, 16 Howard. That was a case that arose by reason of our acquiring California from Mexico through the Mexican war. I quote from the head note or syllabus:

In the war with Mexico the port of San Francisco was conquered by the arms of the United States in the year 1846, and shortly afterwards the United States had military possession of all of Upper California. Early in 1847 the President of the United States, as constitutional Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy, authorised the military and naval commanders of the United States forces in California to exercise the belligerent rights of a conqueror, and to form a civil and military government for the conquered territory, with power to impose duties on imports and tonnage for the support of such government and of the army which had the conquest in possession.

The formation of the civil government in California, when it was done, was the lawful exercise of a belligerent right over a conquered territory. It was the exising government when the territory was ceded to the United States as a conquest, and did not cease as a matter of course or as a consequence of the restoration of peace; and it was rightfully continued after peace was made with Mexico until Congress legislated otherwise, under its constitutional power to dispose of and make all needful rules and regulations respecting the territory or other property belonging to the United States.

The cases of Leitensdorfer vs. Webb (20 Howard, 176) and New Orleans vs. Steamship Company (20 Wallace, 387) are also in point. Can any one doubt the right, authority, and duty of the President, through the Army, to govern and control Porto Rico, Cuba, and the Philippine Islands until Congress shall provide some other form of government or until some disposition is made of those islands? There is no limitation upon the power of Congress to govern, control, and regulate all our territory, no matter how acquired. (Scre vs. Pitot, 6 Cranch, 336-337; American Insurance Company vs. Canter, 1 Peters, 542; Bank of Brunswick vs. Yankton, 101 U. S., 130.) I quote from the decision last cited. The court said:

We do not consider it necessary to decide in this case whether the governor of Dakota had authority to call an extra session of the legislative assembly, nor whether a law passed at such a session or after the limited term of forty days had expired would be valid, because, as we think, the act of May 27, 1872, is equivalent to a grant of power direct from Congress to the county to issue the bonds in dispute. It is certainly now too late to doubt the power of Congress to govern the Territories. There have been some differences of opinion as to the particular clause of the Constitution from which the power comes, but that it exists has always been conceded. The act to adapt the ordinance to provide for the government of the territory northwest of the river Ohio to the requirements of the Constitution (1 Stat. L., 50) is chapter 8 of the first session of the First Congress, and the ordinance itself was in force under the Confederation when the Constitution went into effect.

All territory within the jurisdiction of the United States not included in any State must necessarily be governed by or under the authority of Congress. The Territories are but political subdivisions of the outlying dominion of the United States. They bear much the same relation to the General Government that counties do to the States, and Congress may legislate for them as States do for their respective municipal organizations. The organic law of a Territory takes the place of a constitution as the fundamental law of the local government. It is obligatory on and binds the Territorial authorities, but Congress is supreme, and for the purposes of this department of its governmental authority has all the powers of the people of the United States except such as have been expressly or by implication reserved in the prohibitions of the Constitution.

In the organic act of Dakota there was no express reservation of power in Congress to amend the acts of the Territorial legislature, but none was necessary. Such a power is an incident of sovereignty, and continues until granted away. Congress may not only abrogate laws of the Territorial legislatures, but it may itself legislate directly for the local government. It may make a void act of the Territorial legislature valid and a valid act void. In other words, it has full and complete legislative authority over the people of the Territories and all the departments of the Territorial governments.

The only legal opinion I have seen to the contrary is a dictum of Chief Justice Taney in the Dred Scott case. I say "dictum," for it was only that. The court did not accept it as law; it was not the opinion of the court. And I quote from Judge Taney in another part of his opinion, that which I submit is an admission that Congress has plenary power in the premises:

The power to acquire necessarily carries with it the power to preserve and apply to the purposes for which it was acquired. The form of government to be established necessarily rested in the discretion of Congress. It was their duty to establish the one that would be best suited for the protection and security of the citizens of the United States and other inhabitants who might be authorized to take up their abode there, and that must always depend upon the existing condition of the Territory, as to the number and character of its inhabitants, and their situation in the Territory. In some cases a government consisting of persons appointed by the Federal Government would best subserve the interests of the Territory when the inhabitants were few and scattered and new to one another. In other instances it would be more advisable to commit the powers of self-government to the people who had settled in the Territory as being the most competent to determine what was best for their own interests. But some form of civil authority would be absolutely necessary to organize and preserve civilized society and prepare it to become a State; and what is the best form must always depend on the condition of the Territory at the time, and the choice of the mode must depend upon the exercise of a discretionary power by Congress, acting within the scope of its constitutional authority. (19 How., 448, 449.)

There is no mandate in the Constitution commanding Congress to admit new States; the authority is permissive only: "New States may be admitted by the Congress into this Union." Prior to the time when the Constitution was adopted, prior to the Articles of Confederation and the Declaration of Independence, there existed in this country thirteen distinct, separate colonies, each independent of all the others, and each a political body. They associated together to carry on the Revolutionary war by means of the Continental Congress. Afterwards they formed a National Government under the Articles of Confederation, and later, to make what seemed to them a more perfect Government, they adopted the Constitution of the United States. It has been said that "the Government thus formed, while it was a political partnership between the people, was also a partnership of States."

Any one of the States (partners), in the absence of the permissive, not mandatory, clause already quoted, would have been able to prevent the admission of a new State, to refuse to take into the partnership a new member. Article XI of the Articles of Confederation reads as follows:

ART. XI. Canada, acceding to this confederation, and joining in the measures of the United States, shall be admitted into, and entitled to, all the advantages of this union; but no other colony shall be admitted into the same, unless such admission be agreed to by nine States.

In the convention that framed the Constitution Mr. Randolph introduced a set of resolutions. I copy one:

10. Resolved, That provision ought to be made for the admission of States lawfully arising within the limits of the United States, whether from a voluntary junction of government and territory or otherwise, with the consent of a number of voices in the National Legislature less than the whole. (5 Elliott, 128.)

It would appear that Mr. Randolph was clearly of the opinion that unless provision was made for admission of a State none could be admitted without the consent of all. Later Mr. Pinckney submitted a plan for a Federal Constitution. I quote Article XIV:

ART. XIV. The Legislature shall have power to admit new States into the Union on the same terms with the original States, provided two-thirds of the members present in both Houses agree. (5 Elliott, 132.)

The Randolph resolution was later reported back to the convention. Mr. Patterson proposed an amendment. The whole matter was referred to the committee on detail, which reported back the following:

ART. XVII. New States lawfully constituted or established within the limits of the United States may be admitted by the Legislature into this Government, but to such admission the consent of two-thirds of the members present in each House shall be necessary. If a new State shall arise within the limits of any of the present States, the consent of the legislatures of such States shall be also necessary to its admission. If the admission be consented to, the new States shall be admitted on the same terms with the original States. (5 Elliott, 381.)

This was referred to the committee on style, and was finally adopted as found in the Constitution to-day.

I desire to call attention to the views entertained in 1803, when matters connected with the Louisiana purchase were under consideration.

Senator Plumer, of my State, said:

Admit this western world into the Union, and you destroy at once the weight and importance of the Eastern States and compel them to establish a separate, independent empire.

He was an "imperialist" and anti-expansionist.

Senator Pickering, of Massachusetts, said:

It is declared in the third article (of the treaty) that "The inhabitants of the ceded territory shall be incorporated in the Union of the United States." But neither the President and Senate, nor the President and Congress, are competent to such an act of incorporation. He believed the assent of each individual State to be necessary for the admission of a foreign country as an associate in the Union.

Representative Griffin, of Virginia, said:

He feared the effect of the vast extent of our empire: he feared the effects of the increased value of labor, the decrease in the value of lands, and the influence of climate upon our citizens who should migrate thither. He did fear (though this land was represented as flowing with milk and honey) that this Eden of the New World would prove a cemetery for the bodies of our citizens.

Senator Toucey, of Connecticut, said, speaking upon the same subject at that time:

We can hold territory, but to admit the inhabitants into the Union, to make citizens of them, and States, by treaty, we can not constitutionally do; and no subsequent act of legislation or even ordinary amendment to our Constitution can legalize such measures. If done at all, they must be done by universal consent of all the States or partners to our political association.

Delaware was heard from. Senator James White, of that State, said:

But as to Louisiana, this new, immense, unbounded world, if it should be incorporated into the Union, which I have no idea can be done but by altering the Constitution, I believe it will be the greatest curse that could at present befall us. It may be productive of innumerable evils, and especially of one that I fear to ever look upon. * * * Thus our citizens will be removed to the immense distance of two or three thousand miles from the capital of the Union, where they will scarcely ever feel the rays of the General Government; their affections will become alienated; they will gradually begin to view us as strangers; they will form other commercial connections, and our interests will become distinct. * * * And I do say that under existing circumstances, even supposing that this extent of territory was a desirable acquisition, $15,000,000 was a most enormous sum to give.

Representative Griswold, of Connecticut, said:

It is not consistent with the spirit of a republican government that its territory should be exceedingly large, for as you extend your limits you increase the difficulties arising from a want of that similarity of customs, habits, and manners so essential for its support.

* * * * * * *

It will not be found either in the report of the secret committee, which has recently been published, or in any document or debate that any individual entertained the least wish to obtain the province of Louisiana. Our views were then confined to New Orleans and the Floridas. * * * The vast and unmanageable extent which the accession of Louisiana will give the United States, the consequent dispersion of our population, and the destruction of that balance which it is so important to maintain between the Eastern and Western States threatens at no distant day the subversion of our Union.

It will be observed that the opponents of the pending treaty in the march of progress have got up to 1803, and have exhumed the expressions of the men of that day, which they use with all the apparent satisfaction and enjoyment that a child gets from its first rattle. The same melancholy gloom envelops them that haunted the opponents of annexation in 1803. Note their expressions: "Immense, unbounded worlds," "immense distances," "their affections will become alienated," "a cemetery for the bodies of our citizens," "vast and unmanageable extent," "productive of innumerable evils," "the greatest curse that could at present befall us," "feared the effect of the vast extent of our empire." Eliminate from the speeches and editorials against annexation to-day the expressions borrowed from the men of 1803, and they would be mild as May zephyrs and sweet enough for use at a New England quilting. [Laughter.] I have made the quotations to refute the contention now made that the provision in the Constitution was understood by its framers to be mandatory and compels us to admit to statehood all territory acquired in any manner, regardless of its condition.

I think the evidence I have cited establishes the fact that the framers of the Constitution held the reverse doctrine, and therefore consented to the permissive clause now in the Constitution. I think I ought to say that to my mind the opponents of annexation are entitled to congratulations for that progress that has brought them up to 1803. Glancing at the map of our country, considering for only a moment what annexation has done for us, what our condition would have been to-day but for annexation, and any fair-minded man ought to be satisfied that one possessed of a disposition and mental arrangement that leads him to stand to-day where the opponents of annexation stood in 1803 has "come up through great tribulation;" and I am glad that he is within ninety-six years of the promised land—Porto Rico and the Philippine Islands. With the history of what took place in the convention that framed the Constitution before us, with the record before us of the views entertained on the subject of annexation in connection with the Louisiana Territory in 1803, coupled with the further fact that ever since the adoption of the Constitution we have continuously held, governed, and controlled territory, I think it apparent that the contentions by the opponents of annexation and the treaty have no justification in law or practice.

A word in reply to what is often suggested by the enemies of annexation, that if the Philippine Islands are annexed there will be danger to our toilers by reason of the right that may accrue to the inhabitants of those islands to come here and labor. I assure gentlemen who are preaching that doctrine that it is an idle waste of breath, first, because the laborers of this land have confidence in the Republican party, that by its works and legislation has always cared for them and their interests, and they know it. What do the opponents of the treaty tell us about the inhabitants of the Philippine Islands? Let me quote some of their choice stock-in-trade language by which they describe those people: "Cannibals," "untamed and untamable savages," "wild, ferocious barbarians, that we can only civilize by killing."

They tell us that Christian Spain, impelled only by love and mercy, has been trying for centuries to civilize them, and has endured a humiliating failure; that they prefer to die rather than by annexation become a part of this country. And in the next breath they ask us to believe that those people are so industrious, so ambitious to better their condition, that by an inherent and irrepressible desire to become Yankees they will abandon their native land, their homes, and loved ones, and flock to our shores. To such ridiculous contentions are the enemies of annexation driven. The "wild, ferocious, untamed, and untamable barbarians" that the Administration is "subjugating," "robbing of their liberties," "reducing to vassals," "wickedly" and "unconstitutionally"—these people who "prefer to die" rather than to live under our form of Government will, if we permit, come here in such numbers that they will be injurious to our laboring people! These directly antagonistic propositions, either of which being true would make the others impossible, constitute the most logical plank in the anti-annexationists' platform:

The last stand taken by the opponents of annexation is remarkable for its novelty. I am not informed that it is borrowed from the sepulcher of 1803. They contend that we can not give independence and freedom to the people of Porto Rico and the Philippine Islands without violently wrenching and, perhaps, disjointing our Declaration of Independence, which in substance declares that all men ought to be free. To the authors of this new-born delusion I have only to say, "Your last condition is worse than your first." They quote from the preamble. I desire to quote from the closing paragraph of that Declaration, to evidence what seems to me to have unquestionably been the opinion of the men who gave to the world that Declaration and immortalized the truth it contains—that a nation founded on that Declaration has all the rights that properly grow out of the right of sovereignty:

We therefore * * * do, in the name and by the authority of the good people of these colonies, solemnly publish and declare that these united colonies are, and of right ought to be, free and independent States; * * * and that as free and independent States they have full power to levy war, conclude peace, contract alliances, establish commerce, and do all other acts or things which independent States may of right do.

The tender solicitude the opponents of the treaty and of this measure to increase the Army have lest the President may use it to deprive the "wild, untamed, and untamable, ferocious barbarians" that they tell us the Philippines are of their liberty would have impelled them, had they been in a position to have done so, to have voted, as one member of Congress from New Hampshire did, against making the slave-trade piracy. Quoting from the Declaration of Independence the words "and the pursuit of happiness," he declared that such an enactment would be a violation of an "inalienable right" which the slave trader possessed in "the pursuit of happiness" to steal men, women, and children in Africa, transport them to America, and sell them as slaves.

Mr. Chairman, I have occupied much more than my share of time in this debate. A few words in conclusion and I am done. Our opponents point to Rome and Greece and tell us that colonial possessions ruined them. What nonsense! They were not republics like ours; they were oligarchies. Only the few had a voice in the government; the masses were serfs or slaves, and their conduct toward the inhabitants of acquired territory was invariably that of spoliation. England, the most powerful of nations, with a population in the British Isles of 38,000,000, holds in subjugation to-day, without allowing them any self-government whatever, more than 358,000,000 people. Does anyone imagine that those people are or have been a source of weakness to Great Britain? We have no purpose of that kind. I point to this fact to illustrate that the reverse of our opponents' contention is true, not only in the case of England, Germany, and other imperial powers, but in that of the Republic of France as well, that governs more people in her colonies and outlying territory than she has at home.

On the morning of May 1, 1898, Admiral Dewey, in the Bay of Manila, thousands of miles from a friendly port, standing upon the bridge of the Olympia, with the flag of "imperial" liberty above him, challenged the Spanish admiral in command of a fleet that carried double the number of guns that Dewey's carried, supported by land batteries, to a fight to the finish. The treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo, the Declaration of Independence, and the Constitution of the United States were not much in evidence on that bay that morning; but American ships, American guns, American prowess and heroism were there actively, and there to stay. [Applause.] Every man in our fleet knew that it was victory or the bottom for him. There was not a man under our flag who would have hauled it down or turned his back on our foe in defeat to save his life. Every man was a hero, every hero an expansionist. That victory immortalized our heroes as the Spartans did Thermopylæ. Had those who now shout "Imperialism," "Colonial possessions," "Robbers of the Filipinos' liberty" been there, would they have turned their backs to the Spaniards? If so, mankind would have branded them as cowards. If we turn away and surrender what their matchless valor won, if we leave the Filipinos to be robbed by tyrants or adventurers, the people of every nation on earth, pointing to America, will say: "Her sons are brave in war; her legislators are cowards." I hope and trust they will not have that opportunity.

With a flippancy that evidences lack of thought and inaccuracy of statement our opponents quote a sentence or two from the Farewell Address of George Washington and proceed to arraign us for ignoring and trampling upon the advice of our first President. Let me quote from that same Address:

> With me a predominant motive has been to endeavor to give time to our country to settle and mature its yet recent institutions and to progress without interruption to that degree of strength and consistency which is necessary to give it, humanly speaking, the command of its own fortunes.

To our opponents I say we have got there; we have reached that point in our development to which the author of the words quoted was anxiously looking forward.

I submit that it is patent from the language used that Washington regarded the policy of seclusion as temporary only.

Vast domain is not essential to empire or imperial and despotic rule. The most cruel of tyrants have reigned over but small territory and comparatively few people.

The fact that territory is not contiguous does not make it more desirable for imperial rule, but less so. I am not favoring empire. I desire to add imperial domain to our Republic, and give the inhabitants thereof the blessings we enjoy in the same way and manner that we have acquired territory from the day France ceded Louisiana and have added to and brought under the flag of imperial liberty many times multiplied that we originally possessed.

It is a misfortune that we have so many Rip Van Winkles in this country who can not be made to believe that time passes, progress advances, and trade and commerce increase while they sleep, unconscious of the change. They speak of the distance to the Philippine Islands, 7,000 miles, as something of sufficient importance to deter us from discharging a duty that conscience and the laws and rules of civilized nations make it imperative upon us to perform.

These sleepers, who never dream of what is transpiring in the world to-day, are not aware that Russia has nearly completed from St. Petersburg to the Pacific coast a railroad 6,600 miles in length.

I desire to place in the RECORD a copy of a letter written by Benjamin Franklin in New York City on his way to England to plead the cause of the American people before the privy council. I am indebted to Hon. Charles Marseilles, of Exeter, N. H., for the privilege of making this copy from the original in his possession:

NEW YORK, June 4, 1757—Saturday.

DEAR BROTHER & SISTER: We are now told that we are certainly to sail to-morrow Morning. I wish it may be so, for I am now quite tired with waiting, having been here above 8 Weeks.

I enclose you an Order of Cousin James's on Mr. Collins for 35 Dollars. Please to receive them, and send them ℔ first Safe Hand to my Wife. If you can get it in Gold, it may be enclosed in a little Pacquet & sent ℔ Post.

I pray God to preserve you both, & that I may find you well at my Return. I remain, as ever,

Your affectionate Brother, B. FRANKLIN.

My object in introducing this letter is twofold. First, to show that Franklin was "a goldbug;" and secondly, to prove that Manila is not so far away from San Francisco to-day in point of time as Franklin had to wait in New York for a craft to sail for England. I repeat what I have before said, that, practically speaking, time and distance have been eliminated in the affairs of men, and that our commercial relations with Asiatic people, constantly increasing in volume and profit, compel us as a prudent nation to use all means that we may rightfully to encourage and defend the same.

It is asked, "Why does not the President declare his policy?" He has a duty to perform, and not a policy to enforce. His duty is clear, well defined, and free from doubts. He must, with the military arm of the Government, protect the inhabitants of those islands in all their rights, as it would have been the duty of Spain to do had not her forces stacked their arms pending the ratification of the treaty. If the treaty be ratified, he must continue to use the land and naval forces of the United States to preserve order and enforce obedience to law until such time as Congress shall see fit to legislate. How idle the query, "Why does not the President declare his intention and purposes toward the Philippine Islands and the inhabitants thereof?" The same journals and individuals that urge this question would, if he should express an opinion as to what, in his judgment, would be wise and best to do in the future, rend the air with denunciations and charge that he desired to usurp the power of Congress. Until the treaty is ratified and the war is at an end no such question as that concerning which these men desire an opinion from the President can possibly arise.

We to-day hold those islands by the military arm. If the treaty is ratified, we shall possess them in our sovereign right. Then the President, as Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy, must govern them as best he can by means of our military and naval forces until Congress provides some other form of government or we dispose of them.

Do men forget that the President, by instructions to the commanding general of our forces in the Philippines, stated what our duty and purpose were pending the ratification of that treaty, and directed that the greatest possible publicity be given to the same, and that that adventurer who twice sold himself to Spain and who, if, as some say, he was once our ally is now a traitor, as was Benedict Arnold, ordered that proclamation burned? He is a pirate on land and sea, a betrayer of every cause he ever espoused. They who encourage and admire him must mourn the fate of Captain Jack, the Modoc chief, who shot General Canby under a flag of truce. And they who are denouncing the President for the faithful performance of a duty imposed upon him by law as a public servant are more to be despised than Aguinaldo, for they sin against greater light. [Loud applause.]

[During the delivery of the foregoing remarks Mr. SULLOWAY was interrogated, but declined to yield.]

Mr. MARSH. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. FLETCHER] such time as he desires.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. Chairman, this bill to increase the regular standing army of the United States to 100,000 men is, in my opinion, the most important question before Congress and the people.

We are asked to enact legislation which will, if this bill is passed by Congress, place the United States upon a war footing, so that whatever emergency may arise this Government will not find itself again unprepared to meet a situation which may demand quick and aggressive action.

Those who support the bill as originally reported from the Committee on Military Affairs have told us with patriotic promptings that the passage of the bill is a necessity; that we can no longer maintain our rights and our dignity as a nation unless we have an army of this magnitude.

Mr. Chairman, while I indorse and agree to much that has been said along this line during the debate, I believe we should take up this question not alone as a patriotic measure, but we should consider it as a business proposition also, and carefully examine into all existing conditions in order to determine whether or not this Government should go upon a permanent war footing. I believe we should also look at the future and ascertain so far as may be possible the reasons for establishing and maintaining a large standing army. I know full well the value of being prepared, and of being so situated that it will be comparatively an easy matter to take advantage of an adversary. But should we not consider that the very fact of making too great preparations to meet a situation will tend to bring that situation about?

I want to go just as far as any member of this House in strengthening and aiding the War Department and the Administration in having well-trained soldiers enough to guard and defend every right of the most humble citizen of the United States against the most hostile or unwarranted and unjustified action of any nation in the world.

But I do not want to go to the extent, to use a somewhat familiar phrase heard by most of us when we were schoolboys, of walking around with a chip on our shoulders.

If I can gauge the sentiment of the American people right, they are a peace-loving and a peace-giving people. I well remember the day when the $50,000,000 emergency bill was up here in the House. One of my colleagues from Minnesota in a very short speech embodied a great deal of truth. He said that America means peace and that our Government rests upon the solid foundations of peace and righteousness.

But when forced into a quarrel and our cause is just, then we will fight for peace and to vanquish a foe with more aggressiveness than any other country.

Do we want to maintain an Army of sufficient size and number for the mere purpose of fighting somebody? Or do we want to maintain an Army that will be sufficiently large and well enough equipped to defend every outpost of our territory, protect every foot of our soil from any foreign invasion at the outset of any war, and to hold our position until such time as the national militia—the volunteer forces—could be called into service for action?

In my judgment, Mr. Chairman, it is not necessary to call into service 100,000 men, to keep and maintain such an army, in order to preserve the peace and take care of our possessions.

I believe that 50,000 regular soldiers will be sufficient for all purposes. We are not entering upon any aggressive policy anywhere. We propose to give free and independent government, the same as we enjoy, to Cuba, Porto Rico, and the Philippines. We are bound to do it by a most solemn declaration, which made the war with Spain so justifiable and well grounded that not one of the powers of Europe or any other nation, although they sought for some cause, some circumstance, upon which they might take exception, could say aught against the policy of this Government in its declaration of war and its prompt prosecution of it to an early finish.

It sounds very nice to talk patriotism, and we are easily swayed by sentiment. But it is not at all necessary to increase the Regular Army to 100,000 in order that the American flag shall not be hauled down anywhere where it is now floating. The gunboats of Dewey's fleet and the other squadrons of our Navy, after the record made, is a guarantee that our flag and our citizens will receive due protection. [Applause.] Therefore, this matter of maintaining a large standing army comes down more to a business than a patriotic proposition.

From the information I have been able to obtain and from my observations during the past year, I am satisfied that a regular army of 50,000 men will be sufficient for all purposes. But I am willing to be liberal with the friends of the bill, who are my friends and in whose policies I believe. I will be willing to vote for 60,000 as the limit, but I do not want more officers than are actually needed. I prefer to leave room to promote meritorious men from the ranks.

During the late war thousands of the volunteers were chafing and impatient in the various home camps. There are many regiments that have prayed and petitioned for the honor of going over to Cuba.

I am sure that I will find many who will agree with me in the statement that there are far more officers and soldiers in the Volunteer Army who are complaining because they did not see active service than there are those who are complaining because they did see some fighting. The average man who enlists wants to fight. And I want to say now while the occasion offers that the overzealous efforts of friends at home, in seeking discharges and furloughs for our volunteer boys in the field, did more to create trouble for the War Department than did the volunteers themselves.

I will admit that it costs a great deal more to handle and take care of a volunteer command than it does a Regular Army command.

That is why I am advocating a reasonably fair proposition to give the country a substantial and safe standing army.

But I want to say for the Minnesota volunteer regiments, that it was not their desire or wish, as an organization, to be mustered out of the service until after it was positively known that there would be no more fighting this side of the Philippines.

And no State has made a prouder record than Minnesota in that far-distant land. Much has been said concerning the bringing home of the Thirteenth Volunteer Regiment from Minnesota. That regiment was in at the hardest of the fighting at Manila August 13 last.

They came from the colleges, the high schools, the office, the shop, and the farm. No more patriotic spectacle was ever witnessed than when the young men—the flower of our State—took up the cause of the oppressed and marched forth to do their duty as their forefathers did in the war of the rebellion, and it shall ever be the pride of Minnesota to recall the valor and glory of her citizen soldiers in every emergency.

I hope this bill may be amended along the lines I have suggested and speedily be enacted into law. [Applause.]

Mr. JETT. Mr. Chairman, I now yield to the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. TALBERT] such time as he desires.

Mr. TALBERT. Mr. Chairman, when the war revenue bill was up for consideration last summer I made a speech against it, in which I took the ground that the war then on hand was used as a pretext for its passage, because there could be no chance to pass such a measure in time of peace with its bond provision. Now it is that the party in power again undertakes to pass a measure in this bill under consideration for increasing the standing army, under the pretense that this country will have to continue embroiled in wars in the future. Another false pretext for getting through another measure which could not otherwise pass.

I feel it my solemn duty to oppose this bill—a duty alike to the constituency that I immediately represent and to the great people of whom my constituents form a part. It is not my purpose to make a long and elaborate speech, but merely to record briefly and as clearly as I may some of the reasons which underlie my opposition and to put myself on record against the measure.

No intelligent man will deny that something in the way of a regular army is needed by the United States and no patriotic member of this body will ever vote to withhold support for such military force as the legitimate necessities of the country require. But, in my judgment, the force provided by this bill is far and away beyond the needs of the country. It certainly is, unless it be for the purpose of carrying out a policy entirely new in our national affairs, altogether at variance with our time-honored traditions, one, as I believe, that is contrary to the best interests of the great body of the American people, fraught with danger to the Republic, and striking at the very foundations of free government the world over.

For what reason, Mr. Chairman, should the Army of the United States, on a peace footing, be suddenly raised from about 26,000 men to more than 100,000? Granting that perhaps two or three regiments of artillery could be used to good advantage in garrisoning the forts along our extended seaboard; granting that from time to time small additions may, with propriety, be made in the form of skeleton organizations to protect our varied and growing interests, as well as to serve as a nucleus for a larger army in time of war; conceding all this, where or what is the emergency that calls for the quadrupling of our military force at a single step? Are the people by whose suffrages we hold our seats in this body showing signs of restiveness under the boundless prosperity(?) which certain classes claim is now throwing its refulgent gleams of sunshine over the land?

Can it be that men who are riding the heaving billows of Republican prosperity actually require a strong Republican army to convince them of the fact? Or is it the truth that the prosperity of which we hear so much is, after all, the exclusive property of the trusts, the speculators, and the money changers, who are anxious for a strong army to protect them in their "vested rights." These are classes that naturally turn to the Republican party to shield them and aid them in every abuse, that never fail to respond freely to the calls of Republican campaign managers whenever the people are to be educated in the principles of "sound money," "business integrity," and "exalted political morality."

Can it be that these classes are to any extent responsible for the sudden conversion of so large a proportion of the Republican party leaders to the idea of a great standing army? Surely this can not be. It seems incredible that the Republican leaders, acting at the dictation of the "money power," are deliberately forging chains of oppression for the American laborer by increasing the burden of his taxes, and with the money thus wrung from him creating a vast army to shoot him down if he should manifest any unpleasant signs of discontent.

But what is the reason for this marvelous change in Republican sentiment? Are we threatened with foreign war? Not at all. On the contrary we have just finished up the war with Spain, and are now apparently entering upon a long period of peace, unless we by our own action bring about a struggle with some foreign nation or people. The question, then, arises against whom are these 100,000 men to be employed? And who are to pay the countless millions of taxes thus imposed upon the people?

Mr. Chairman, so far as our internal affairs are concerned there is absolutely no reason for such an increase of the Army. Unless there is a purpose to trample upon the liberties of our own people, this measure is manifestly designed to enable the Administration to strike down and strangle the spirit of freedom in some other land.

This, sir, is the legitimate result of that wild, unreasoning fever of "expansion" or "imperialism," call it by whichever term we may, that has temporarily blinded the vision, warped the judgment, and blunted the sense of justice of so many of our people. There can be no earthly doubt that the Administration has entered upon the policy of holding in subjection the people of distant lands, with or without their consent, and wants an army to enforce such action if they resist. The closest scrutiny of the world's political horoscope suggests no other use for such an army. I do not stand here for the purpose of making an unreasoning and senseless onslaught upon the principles of expansion.

Some there are who assume that expansion is so good a thing that we must take and hold every foot of territory that we can get, no matter to whom it rightfully belongs or what principles of natural justice we must trample upon in order to do so. Others go to the opposite extreme and profess to see danger in any expansion, no matter where or under what circumstances. I think that every case should stand upon its own basis of facts. Up to a certain point I am an expansionist. It is perfectly obvious that the tendencies of civilized men are to unite into great nationalities. This is the result of the warlike spirit and ambition which has hitherto prevailed even among the most advanced and intelligent peoples.

Under such conditions the countries which fail to expand and increase in power will almost certainly fall a prey to the ambition and rapacity of those which do. But no such conditions exist in this country to-day. We have already "expanded." From a narrow fringe of sparsely settled colonies along the Atlantic seaboard we have moved with giant strides to the west, over the Alleghanies and across the fertile prairies of the Mississippi Valley. We have climbed the lofty slopes of the Rocky Mountains, traversed the great basin, mounted the heights of the snow-crowned Sierras, and pressed on to the westward, until the waters of the vast Pacific barred our farther progress.

Lying in one massive block, with the Atlantic on the east and the Pacific on the west, secure from either European or Asiatic aggression, with no present or prospective enemy either north or south that we need fear, with a vast domain almost in the infancy of its development, our territory has been expanded to the fullest limit of necessity. The moment we pass the limit of necessity we enter a field of unknown dangers. Many doubted the wisdom of the Alaska purchase, and others seriously questioned the policy of annexing Hawaii.

It remains to be seen, when some emergency arises, whether those possessions are elements of strength or weakness. There is, perhaps, room for honest differences of opinion as to whether we should permanently hold Porto Rico, and the question of the future acquisition, with the consent of its people, of course, of Cuba may hereafter become a fairly debatable question. But the case of the Philippines is altogether different from either and radically different from any of the precedents upon which the extreme advocates of expansion rely. If there is a single valid argument in favor of our permanently holding the Philippine archipelago, I have never yet heard it. It is shouted that the islands are very rich and that we want them. That is the alpha and omega of the expansion cry, save as it is embellished by abuse of those who venture to think that it is neither wise nor just to take and hold the islands against the wishes of the people who inhabit them.

The only argument made in favor of holding the Philippines may be met and disposed of by simply quoting the divine command, "Thou shalt not steal." If the inhabitants of those islands were clamoring for us to take them, it would be bad policy for us to do so. They are already densely populated by heterogeneous races, at least nine-tenths of whom are not and never will be fit for "friendly assimilation" with the citizens of this Republic. Such an assimilation means either the subjugation of the weaker races or the moral and social degradation of the stronger. Standing as we do, face to face with the race problem in the South, the American who will deliberately enter upon the policy of "friendly assimilation" with eight or ten millions of Filipinos is either woefully lacking in intelligence or he is not a true friend of his country. The next and logical step would be to assimilate fifty or a hundred millions of Chinamen.

But, Mr. Chairman, "friendly assimilation" is wholly out of the question, for the simple reason that the Filipinos refuse to be thus "assimilated." If they were ready to accept our sovereignty and take their chances of fair treatment, would Mr. McKinley's Administration, his friends and supporters in Congress, be now vociferously demanding a vast standing army? Is an army of 100,000 men, armed with Mauser guns and Krag-Jorgensen rifles, intended as an instrument of "friendly assimilation?"

Mr. Chairman, one of two things is certainly true: Either this great army is intended to be used against our own people or it is designed for use against some other. Which is it? We challenge the friends of the measure to tell us against whom it is to be employed. It is no answer to say that conditions may arise in which it may be needed. The same contention could be made in favor of an army of a million, for it may be that some time we shall need such a military force. But so far as the defense of our own territory is concerned, no man having a just conception of the character of the American people can doubt that they will be equal to any emergency that may arise. Their courage and patriotism have never yet failed, and they never will unless they be destroyed by the inauguration of a policy which teaches them to rely upon a standing army of soldiers for protection, which standing army will, according to different estimates, saddle upon the people an annual expense of from $98,000,000 to $150,000,000, in addition to billion-dollar Congresses already fastened upon them.

In any possible aspect of the question this measure is utterly indefensible. If the Army is intended for home defense, it is an unnecessary burden; if designed for the subjection of some other people to our rule it is an abomination in the sight of God and all honest men. If the purpose be to hold the Philippines against their will or to deprive the people of Cuba of the free and independent government that we have solemnly promised them, then the force proposed is entirely too small. Let gentlemen remember that 200,000 Spanish troops were insufficient to crush the spirit of liberty in Cuba alone. Let them remember that during three centuries of nominal ownership Spain obtained actual possession and control of but a small portion of the Philippine Archipelago.

Let them remember that those islands lie 7,000 miles from San Francisco, almost under the equator, and that except under the most favorable circumstances they are practically uninhabitable by men of the Anglo-Saxon race. No matter what force we might send there, the natives could retreat into the mountain fastnesses and carry on a desultory guerrilla warfare for years. Two hundred thousand men would not suffice to effect a complete conquest of the islands if the natives intelligently make use of the natural advantages of their position. How many thousands and tens of thousands of our young men would be sacrificed in this insensate crusade I would not venture to say.

That our losses would be terrible no intelligent man will deny, and for what purpose? Simply to prove that we can whip the Filipinos and secure some imaginary commercial advantages. Even if the right were upon our side, it would be nothing less than national idiocy on our part to attempt it. The proposition brings up clearly and forcibly Burke's famous simile about shearing the wolf. "What! Shear a wolf?" "Yes," was the reply; "it is my wolf and I have a right to shear him." "But have you considered how little wool you will get?" "I care nothing about that; he is my wolf and I will shear him." "Think, though, of the danger and difficulty of shearing this wild beast." "No matter; he is my wolf. I have the power to shear him and I will."

My word for it, Mr. Chairman, the shearing of the Philippine wolf will be quite as difficult, quite as dangerous, and quite as profitless as was the shearing of the wolf in which Great Britain was then engaged.

Mr. Chairman, a year ago had the proposition been made for us to take the Philippine Islands, even with the free consent of their people, it would have been rejected as an action fraught with danger to the Republic. Such a thing had never been thought of. What has happened to bring about the apparent change in public sentiment? Nothing, save that Admiral Dewey destroyed the Spanish fleet in Manila Bay. But that in no manner affects the merits of the question. It makes the islands no more valuable than they were; it gives us no right to deny freedom to the people who denied the rightful sovereignty of Spain.

If Dewey had found the Spanish fleet somewhere else, he would have destroyed it just the same. The mere circumstance that the battle was fought at Manila changes no principle of international law, no rule of natural justice, and it should not lead us to depart from the foundation principle upon which the American Republic was organized, namely, that "governments derive their just powers from the consent of the governed."

I have no desire to paint too gloomy a picture of the possible results of our holding the Philippines by force. We might do it and survive; we might trample out liberty there and preserve something like liberty at home. But no fair-minded man can deny that it brings us face to face with dangers new and unknown. Not only are we asked to make war upon a people whose only wrong is the desire to be free, but we are asked to load ourselves down with burdens of largely increased taxation in order to enable us to do so.

Besides all this, it is quite certain to give rise to complications with other great powers, the results of which no man can foretell. At this juncture, when our President, from a timid and shrinking opponent of the war for humanity in Cuba, seems to have developed an insatiable appetite for conquest and territorial aggrandizement, it may not be out of place for me to read briefly from the remarks of another great Ohioan on the subject of expansion. They are a little overdrawn in their application to the question then before the country, but well worthy of consideration in the light of the situation as it exists to-day. I read from a speech of the Hon. Thomas Corwin:

Mr. President, this uneasy desire to augment our territory has depraved the moral sense and blunted the otherwise keen sagacity of our people. What has been the fate of all nations who have acted upon the idea that they must advance? Our young orators cherish this notion with a fervid but fatally mistaken zeal. They call it by the mysterious name of "destiny." "Our destiny," they say, is "onward," and hence they argue, with ready sophistry, the propriety of seizing upon any territory and any people that may lie in the way of our "fated" advance. Recently these progressives have grown classical; some assiduous student of antiquities has helped them to a patron saint. They have wandered back into the desolated Pantheon, and there, among the Polytheistic relics of that "pale mother of dead empires," they have found a god whom these Romans, centuries gone by, baptized "Terminus."

Sir, I have heard much and read somewhat of this gentleman, Terminus. Alexander, of whom I have spoken, was a devotee of this divinity. We have seen the end of him and his empire. It was said to be an attribute of this god that we must always advance and never recede. So both republican and imperial Rome believed. It was, as they said, their destiny. And for a while it did seem to be even so. Roman Terminus did advance. Under the eagles of Rome he was carried from his home on the Tiber to the farthest East on the one hand, and to the far West, among the then barbarous tribes of western Europe, on the other. But at length the time came when retributive justice had become "a destiny."

The despised Gaul calls out the contemned Goth, and Attila, with his Huns, answers back the battle shout to both. The "blue-eyed nations of the north," in succession or united, pour forth their countless hosts of warriors upon Rome and Rome's always-advancing god Terminus. And now the battle-ax of the barbarian strikes down the conquering eagle of Rome. Terminus at last recedes, slowly at first, but finally he is driven to Rome, and from Rome to Byzantium. Whoever would know the further fate of this Roman deity, so recently taken under the patronage of American Republicanism, may find ample gratification of his curiosity in the luminous pages of Gibbon's "Decline and Fall."

Such will find that Rome thought as you now think—that it was her destiny to conquer provinces and nations—and no doubt she sometimes said, as you say, "I will conquer a peace," and where now is she, the mistress of the world? The spider weaves his web in her palaces; the owl sings his watch song in her towers. Teutonic power now lords it over the servile remnant, the miserable memento of old and once omnipotent Rome. Sad, very sad, are the lessons which time has written for us. Through and in them all I see nothing but the inflexible execution of that old law which ordains as eternal that cardinal rule, "Thou shalt not covet thy neighbor's goods, nor anything which is his."

For the reasons which I have thus briefly generalized, and many others that I have not the time to touch, I feel it my duty to oppose this measure in the interest of the people I have the honor to represent upon this floor.

I commend this language to the earnest and prayerful attention of those who are pressing this measure as being appropriate to the present occasion. I can not conscientiously support the bill under consideration, but will vote for the substitute offered by the gentleman from Virginia, as being the choice of evils as they exist to-day. [Loud applause.]

Mr. MARSH. Mr. Chairman, I now yield twenty minutes to the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. WHITE].

Mr. WHITE of North Carolina. Mr. Chairman, I supported very cheerfully all measures tending to bring about the recent war for liberating a very much oppressed and outraged people. I supported with equal cheer all appropriations that were necessary for the successful prosecution of that war to a final termination. I thought it was necessary then; I think now that it was a necessity. It has been the province of the people of the United States at all times to extend a helping hand to the oppressed, to the outraged—I mean, of course, without the borders of the United States.

Being a member of this great Republic and one of the Representatives on this floor, I gave my support in voice and in every way that I could to all measures tending to the liberation of these poor people in Cuba. I now favor the acquisition of all of the territory that is within our grasp as a result of that war. [Applause.]

To say that we will not accept, to say that we will not take these acquisitions, and to say that we will not extend to the people thereof the civilization of our country, the Christian manhood and womanhood we enjoy, is to do them a wrong and to take steps backward. I therefore favor the annexation of the Philippine Islands, and I also favor the bill now pending before this House for the extension of our standing Army commensurate with our new conditions.

Our Army up to the time of this recent war was a mere bagatelle. It was not at all in keeping with the great nation that we are. Our Navy consisted of only a few crafts hanging around our shores, and the condition we were found in at the beginning of the American-Spanish war is too well known to us all to require any discussion on my part.

In times of peace it is well to prepare for war. We are now at peace, but it may not be thirty days before we shall be thrown into another war. Who can tell? Certainly if this discussion goes on, the treaty being considered in the other end of the Capitol being transferred, in part, to this end of the Capitol, and being of such character so as to encourage and inflame those of the Philippines opposed to annexation, it is most likely that it will not be thirty days before we will be at war again. Therefore I favor action upon this bill and extending our Army so that it will be ample for all emergencies that may arise.

Mr. Chairman, it is not so much on account of the recent war with Spain, or the money it took to carry on that war, or the annexation of Cuba, or Porto Rico, or the Philippine Islands that I desire to speak, nor is it so much the pending bill we have before us that I desire to address myself to this House.

But it is another problem, possibly more vexing than the one we have now under consideration. I know that you will pardon me if I do not address myself to the question before us when you recollect that I am the only representative on this floor of 10,000,000 people, from a racial standpoint. They have no one else to speak for them, from a race point of view, except myself. I shall therefore address the remainder of my remarks to another phase of the situation in this country—to another great problem that confronts us, and one which I trust ere long we shall have the manhood to stand up in our places and meet like American citizens, not like sectional cowards. I refer to the race problem. I have sat here in my place and heard discussions pro and con; I have heard my race referred to in terms anything else than dignified and complimentary. I have heard them referred to as savages, as aliens, as brutes, as vile and vicious and worthless, and I have heard but little or nothing said with reference to their better qualities, their better manhood, their developed American citizenship. It is therefore in reply to those seemingly unguarded expressions that I wish to speak.

I have listened to gentlemen here—particularly one of the gentlemen from the State of Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] in his great eloquence about "white supremacy"—just here permit me to say that I have no respect for a "supremacy," white or black, which has been obtained through fraud, intimidation, carnage, and death—"white supremacy" in the great State of Mississippi; about the Anglo-Saxon ruling this country. I did not know that it required any specific reference of this kind for the world to know the fact that the Anglo-Saxon will rule the United States. We constitute as a race less than one-seventh, possibly, of the population. We have been enslaved; we have done your bidding for two hundred and forty years without any compensation; and we did it faithfully. We do not revert to it grumblingly or regretfully, but we refer to it because it seems ungracious in you now, after you have had all this advantage of us, after you have had all this labor of ours, to be unwilling, at this late day, to give us a man's share in the race of life.

That is the only sense in which I refer to it. It is not with a view to digging up the past. It is not with a view of kindling renewed animosity between the races, but only in answer to those who slur at us and remind us of our inferiority. Yes, by force of circumstances, we are your inferiors. Give us two hundred and forty years the start of you, give us your labor for two hundred and forty years without compensation, give us the wealth that the brawny arm of the black man made for you, give us the education that his unpaid labor gave your boys and girls, and we will not be begging, we will not be in a position to be sneered at as aliens or members of an inferior race. Not at all.

We are inferior. We regret it. But if you will only allow us an opportunity we will amend our ways, we will increase our usefulness, we will become more and more intelligent, more and more useful to the nation. It is a chance in the race of life that we crave. We do not expect any special legislation. We do not expect the mythical "40 acres and a mule."

The mule died long ago of old age, and the land grabbers have obtained the 40 acres. We do not expect any of those things. But we have a right to expect a man's chance and opportunity to carve out our own destiny. That is all we ask, and that we demand.

This problem is confronting the nation. We seem as a race to be going through just now a crucible, a crisis—a peculiar crisis. It is not necessary, nor have I the time, to enter into any explanation as to what brought about this crisis. I may say, however, in passing, that possibly more than by any other one thing it has been brought about by the fact that despite all the oppression which has fallen upon our shoulders we have been rising, steadily rising, and in some instances we hope ere long to be able to measure our achievements with those of all other men and women of the land. This tendency on the part of some of us to rise and assert our manhood along all lines is, I fear, what has brought about this changed condition.

Shall the nation stand by listlessly, or shall it uphold the principles that it has established? Shall it recognize, as declared in the organic law, that all men are born free and equal and are endowed with certain inalienable rights, among which are life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness?

During the discussions here since the pendency of the treaty of peace I have heard a good deal said, both in this House and at the other end of the Capitol, about the Declaration of Independence and the Constitution of the United States. I have heard a good deal said about Thomas Jefferson and others who had to do with the drafting of that instrument. And it has been alleged that they did not mean what they said in that declaration, for the reason that at the very time it was promulgated they owned slaves, and therefore when they spoke of all men being free and equal they did not mean the black population. The Constitution is a very elastic instrument when you have a purpose to serve. Public sentiment is law, and law, when properly executed, is public sentiment.

I heard once of a learned old lawyer who was instructing his class preparatory to their examination before the supreme court of the State for license. He said to them one day, "My dear boys, whenever you have a case in regard to which the law is in your favor and the facts against you, you must lean hard on the law; but if the law is against you and the facts in your favor, then lean hard on the facts." One bright young fellow said, "Well, Judge, suppose both the law and the facts are against us, then what must we do?" "Ah, my boys," said the Judge, "then you must beat about the bush." It occurs to me, sir, that every time a construction of the Constitution or an interpretation of the law is made with reference to the humble race with which I am identified, the principle of that old judge's instruction is brought into play. If the law is in favor of the negro and the facts rather against him, they lean hard on the facts. If the reverse is true, they lean hard on the law in the construction of a statute with reference to him; but if the negro happens to have both the law and the facts on his side, all the decisions touching his rights seem to be beating around the bush. I regret to say it, and I say it with respect, with no intention of reflecting upon anybody or any branch of this Government.

Now, the problem to which I refer not only touches my people, but in my humble judgment it reaches out and ramifies and affects every citizen of the American Republic. How long will we sit—I say "we." I will sit here only two years longer, should I live, and I am going to try mighty hard to live that long. How long will you sit in your seats here and see the principles that underlie the foundation of this Government sapped little by little, but nevertheless surely sapped away? I took the pains this afternoon to run over one or two of the States that have been harping, through their representatives, most about the colored man on this floor since I have been in Congress.

I took up Mississippi, because I recall that two gentlemen from that State especially—I have reference to Congressman ALLEN and Congressman WILLIAMS—have taken special pains on several occasions to refer to the negro; they referred to him in a slurring way, referred to him as something to be managed, referred to him as something to be gotten rid of, referred to him as somebody that must be—oh, well, Congressman ALLEN told a yarn here one day—"transferred," I believe he called it. He must be "transferred." Well, now, here is the situation. I could not say much with reference to him, but here is the situation, taking his district in the State of Mississippi.

I deal with 1896, because I could not get the figures of last November. I find in the gentleman's district there were only 8,418 votes cast for all the candidates in that district, while the estimated vote of the district is 28,663. I found in the Second district that the estimated vote was 34,102. The Congressman said that he got a plurality of 254 over his opponent, but did not give us the benefit of how many he got. I presume a few thousand. In the Third district the estimated vote is 36,859, and 4,050 were cast in the Presidential election of 1896. I found in the Fourth district there was an estimated vote of 42,647. There were votes cast for all the candidates, Democrats, Republicans, Populists, Free-soilers, hottentots, and everybody else, 11,737.

In the Fifth district the estimated vote is 44,923, and there were 13,700 votes cast for all the candidates.

In the Sixth district there were 33,882 votes estimated and there were cast nobody knows how many. Here is the note in the Directory:

Elected as a Democrat, practically without opposition, to fill out an unexpired term—and so forth. Practically without opposition!

In the Seventh district the estimated vote is 37,338, and there were cast 8,647 votes.

The total vote cast for Congressmen in the State of Mississippi in the year 1896, leaving out the Second and Sixth districts, where the vote is not given, was 45,867 out of a total vote of between 250,000 and 300,000.

Mr. BRUCKER. Was that at the Presidential election?

Mr. WHITE of North Carolina. That was at the Presidential election in the year 1896. These were the votes cast for Congressmen as they themselves have given them in the Congressional Directory. Here they are. Where are the others? Echo answers "Where?" White supremacy to get rid of negro domination? I do not know whether the negroes ever dominated in Mississippi or not. If they did, it is the only State outside of South Carolina for a while that they ever did dominate. They certainly never dominated the State wherein I live. We have no ambition to dominate, but we would like to be given a chance by the side of other men to work out our destiny and paddle our own canoe.

I find in the State of South Carolina, adjoining the State that I hail from, a similar situation of affairs. I suppose I might give these facts and figures, because the public would like to know these things, and everyone can not get hold of a Congressional Directory.

In the First district of South Carolina the estimated vote is 34,664; the vote cast, 7,303. In the Second district the estimated vote is 29,265; the vote cast, 8,634. In the Third district the estimated vote is 30,412 and the votes cast 10,536, or about one-third.

In the Fourth district the estimated vote is 40,000; the vote cast, 12,180. In the Fifth district the estimated vote is 28,350, and the vote cast is 8,833.

In the Sixth district the estimated vote is 30,770, and we have this entry, no figures being given at all:

Elected as a Democrat without opposition, having received the entire vote cast.

A popular man! In the Seventh district the estimated vote is 35,736, while the vote cast was 9,407. The total vote cast, leaving out those two districts where the gentlemen did not give the public the benefit of the votes cast for them—the total vote cast for Congressmen in that State in that election was 56,953, while the estimated vote of the State of South Carolina is about 250,000, about one-fifth of the entire voting population having actually voted.

Now, I am not going to grumble about the number of votes that you cast down there in South Carolina, but I want to say to the Congress of the United States, and through Congress to the people of the United States, that South Carolina, Louisiana, Mississippi, and every other State in this Union ought to have the benefit of the votes that are allowed to be cast in their representation on this floor, and no more.

It is not fair to the other States of the Union to say that one gentleman shall come here from a district giving 30,000, 40,000, 50,000, or even 60,000 votes, and that a district in Mississippi or a district in Louisiana or a district in South Carolina, or possibly pretty soon a district in North Carolina, shall come here with a like population with only five or six thousand votes cast, with the others disfranchised and not allowed to vote. If we are unworthy of suffrage, if it is necessary to maintain white supremacy, if it is necessary for the Anglo-Saxon to sway the scepter in those States, then you ought to have the benefit only of those who are allowed to vote, and the poor men, whether they be black or white, who are disfranchised ought not to go into the representation of the district or the State. It is a question that this House must deal with some time, sooner or later.

It may seem a little strange to hear me speak, but nobody else has tackled this question because the boot does not pinch anybody else as it does me and my race. But it will come home to you. You will have to meet it. You have got this problem to settle, and the sooner it is settled the better it will be for all parties concerned. I speak this in all charity. I speak this with no hostility. I am not a pessimist. I take rather the other view. I am optimistic in my views and believe that these problems will adjust themselves one day. I believe that the negro problem in less than fifty years will be a thing of the past.

When it is recalled that thirty-three years ago, one generation ago, four and a half millions of these people were liberated on the plantations of their former masters, and that right by their side they have worked out their destiny thus far, have arisen from poverty to a taxation of four hundred millions of property in the United States; when it is remembered that they have arisen from no homes to the purchase, in many instances, of decent tracts of land, with splendid homes and good property, I think I am justified in saying that this problem will work itself out. Many of them have acquired professions. We are ramifying and stretching out as best we can in all departments of life, with a view to making ourselves good citizens.

And my plea is not against Mississippi, not against South Carolina, not against Louisiana, but for justice—simple justice. Unmitigated justice is what we ask. You are not afraid of the black man overriding and overawing you. He is your neighbor. He is your friend. The chord that exists between some of the whites and the blacks of the South can not be severed by all of the bloody assassins of the world. But you have got the wrong conception. You have got the idea that any means that will disfranchise him and prevent him from exercising the rights which are given him under the Constitution is legitimate, that the end justifies the means. It is a wrong conception of a civilized government. It is the wrong conception of American citizenship, and the sooner we all reach the conclusion that we are here together, here to live and here to die, the better for all concerned, because the black man is here to stay for all time to come.

The Indian has been driven to the West. He has been driven to the little reservations, and he numbers now only a few hundred thousand. He has died and has been killed and his numbers reduced to a minimum, and in a hundred years hence a few mummies in the Smithsonian Institution or somewhere else will represent an extinct race that was once very distinct in the United States. Not so with the negro; never. He did not come to this country of his own motion; he is not here of his own act; but being here, and his planting upon this soil being coequal with his white neighbor, he is here to stay from now henceforth and forever. He will not die out. I know that some of our friends have consulted the statistics and find that the mortality of the negro in some large cities is very great, and they think he will soon die out. They forget that the bulk of the negro race have never seen a large city, but are healthy and hearty and prolific on the plantations throughout the country.

Yes, we are on the increase. The war emancipated four and a half millions. The census of next year will register ten millions. The proportion that we occupy with reference to the white people will never increase, but will gradually diminish; but the number of negroes in this country will continually increase.

I say it will never increase, because we do not import negroes into the United States. It is an evident fact that the "riffraff" of all the nations of the earth enter this country except negroes. And, strange to say, they find open doors and find open hearts, and soon mingle and commingle with all the people of this country and are lost in the great civilization of this country. We do not ask to be assimilated; we do not ask to be amalgamated; we do not ask for anything but to remain a distinct and separate race as we are, and to be permitted to work out our own manhood and womanhood. We do not expect anything else.

Now, gentlemen, what are you going to do with this problem, with this question? I believe the time is coming very soon when the color of a man's skin, so far as business relations are concerned, so far as citizenship is concerned, will cut no figure at all. A man will be regarded as a man whether wrapped in a white or a black skin. I believe the time will come when we will have no more riots in the South on account of color, when civilization will so develop all over this nation that there will be no more lynchings and barbarity and mobocracy, now so prevalent in some portions of this country.

When the black man, through toil and economy, shall have acquired property and wealth and all those things that make a good American citizen, and when all the barriers of legislation now in the way shall disappear, he will be taken by the hand as a man. I believe the time will come—yes, soon—when the condition that prevails to-day in Boston, in grand old Massachusetts, where all are recognized, both black and white, will prevail in South Carolina, North Carolina, Louisiana, and Mississippi. We can not live on the dead ashes of the past. Slavery and its institutions, racial distinctions and wrongs will come to an end. We are going forward; we are looking out; we are stretching out our arms all over the United States. The nation must care for those at home as well as those abroad.

Our ratio of representation is poor. We are taunted with being uppish; we are told to be still; to keep quiet. How long must we keep quiet? We have kept quiet while numerically and justly we are entitled to 51 members of this House; and I am the only one left. We kept quiet when numerically we are entitled to a member of the Supreme Court. We have never had a member and probably never will; but we have kept quiet. We have kept quiet while numerically and justly, according to our population as compared with all the other races of the world, so far as the United States are concerned, we should have the recognition of a place in the President's Cabinet; but we have not had it. Still we have kept quiet, and are making no noise about it.

We are entitled to 13 United States Senators, according to justice and according to our numerical strength, but we have not one, and possibly never will get another; and yet we keep quiet. We have kept quiet while hundreds and thousands of our race have been strung up by the neck unjustly by mobs of murderers. If a man commits a crime he will never find an apologist in me because his face is black. He ought to be punished, but he ought to be punished according to the law as administered in a court of justice. But we keep quiet; do not say it, do not talk about it. How long must we keep quiet, constantly sitting down and seeing our rights one by one taken away from us? As slaves it was to be expected; as slaves we were docile and easily managed; but as citizens we want and we have a right to expect all that the law guarantees to us.

We are passing, as we trust, from ignorance to intelligence. The process may be slow; we may be impatient; you may be discouraged; public sentiment may be against us because we have not done better, but we are making progress. Do you recollect in history any race of people placed in like circumstances who have done any better than we have? Give us a chance, and we will do more. We plead to all of those who are here legislating for the nation that while your sympathy goes out to Cuba—and we are legislating for Cuba—while your hearts burst forth with great love for humanity abroad, remember those who are at our own door. Remember those who have worked for you; remember those who have loved you, who have held up your hands, who have felled your forests, have digged your ditches, who have filled up your valleys and have lowered the mountains, and have helped to make the great Southland what it is to-day. We are entitled to your recognition. We do not ask for domination. We ask and expect a chance in legislation, and we will be content with nothing else.

In the language of another, who has put it possibly very much better than I can:

> We are passing from the ignorance and superstition fostered by years of thraldom to the intelligence which freedom predicates; from the immorality of two hundred and forty years to the higher standard of morality which ever characterizes the daily life of the highest social and scholastic circles; from the muscle and sinew power of the past to the multitudinous appliances of the improved machinery of the present.
> We are living in a grand and awful time. We are measured not by the number of pounds which we are able to lift from the earth, but by that other power which is required to move the world.
> Man's importance has been most beautifully delineated by Dr. Watts, who says:
>
> "Were I so tall to reach the pole,
> Or mete the ocean with my span,
> I must be measured by my soul;
> The mind's the standard of the man."

It is that standard, it is that measurement that we are willing to be measured by. It is by that standard we would like you to gauge us, and not the texture of our hair, not the color of our skin, not our flat noses, but the standard of the man that we would like to be measured by. This broad problem of giving us a man's chance confronts us; it is one well worthy of you.

I was up in Saratoga a few years ago, and in conversation with a gentleman there inquired how the people got along. I went before the season opened. Everything looked barren and bleak. He said, "Well, in the summer we live by skinning the visitors who have come here." I said, "I can very well understand that; but how do you get along in the winter?" "Then," said he, "we skin each other." [Laughter.] Gentlemen, the process of skinning the negro is nearly over. You have about completed the job. Gentlemen of the North, of the East, and of the West, yes, and you of the South, when that is done you have got to have somebody to skin, and you will turn on each other, and then possibly the negro will get his just deserts. [Laughter.]

It is well to stop and consider; you can not always keep a free man down. When he is once made free, it will be difficult to ever enslave him again, either physically or intellectually. Physical slavery is a thing nobody wants. The most ignorant of our Southern sand lappers out in the woods do not want actual slavery again; but there is a slavery that is even worse than manual slavery—the slavery of the mind, the beclouded intellect. It is there that we ask you to help lift the curtain of darkness, the curtain of ignorance, the curtain of vice that you helped to nail and foist upon us, to help break the shackles, that we may look forth in the noonday of life, in the tide of progress and beauty, that we may go up the hill with you, that we may leave the miasmatic valley of vice and degradation and climb to the top of the mount, where we can breathe God's pure air as American citizens.

Recognize your citizen at home, recognize those at your door, give them the encouragement, give them the rights that they are justly entitled to, and then take hold of the people of Cuba and help establish a stable and fixed government among them; take hold of the Porto Ricans, establish the government there that wisdom predicated, which justice may dictate. Take hold of the Philippine Islands, take hold of the Hawaiian Islands, there let the Christian civilization go out and magnify and make happy those poor, half-civilized people; and then the black man, the white man—yes, all the riff-raff of the earth that are coming to our shores—will rejoice with you in that we have done God's service and done that which will elevate us in the eyes of the world. [Prolonged applause.]

Mr. VINCENT. Mr. Chairman, as between the bill under consideration and the substitute offered by the minority of the committee, it seems to me that no member of this House should hesitate very long in deciding in favor of the substitute. Everything that can be said in favor of this bill will apply with equal force to the substitute bill, while the latter has many good features which are not contained in the former.

This bill provides for a permanent standing army of over 100,000 men—four times as large as we had at the close of the civil war. Nobody has shown and no one can show why the Army should be increased fourfold for an indefinite period. It is conceded that the Regular Army as at present constituted may possibly not be sufficient to meet the conditions that now exist and the contingencies that may arise during the next year or two, but the bill offered by the minority provides for 50,000 volunteers, to be mustered out at the end of two years. Possibly it might be better to make this three years. It also provides for 30,000 permanent troops, so that there is only a difference of about 20,000 in the number of soldiers provided for in the two bills. Better increase the number of volunteers to 70,000 than to provide for a permanent standing Army of three or four times as many as we need under ordinary circumstances.

Mr. Chairman, it has been a long cherished desire among certain classes in this country that the standing Army should be greatly increased, and those who have carefully watched public events for the past twenty years know why this is so. It is the opinion of some persons who have the temerity to reason from cause to effect that our soldiers may be used some time to shoot down Americans, without just cause, instead of foreigners. It is a significant fact that since the era of corporation rule set in and since our beneficent social system developed the tramp, the lockout, and the strike, the Army has never been called out to suppress or hold in check the corporation, but always to suppress the striker.

While it is true the strikers have often been in the wrong, the corporations have not always been right. Whether the necessity exists or not, whether right or wrong, it is not disputed that the great corporate interests of the country have been and are now demanding a large standing army. The sentiment has prevailed from the very foundation of our Government down to the present hour, and that sentiment is based upon the history of other nations and upon common sense and reason, that large standing armies are dangerous to the people's liberties. In those countries where tyranny is most oppressive and where the common people are looked upon as little better than beasts of burden, there you will find the largest standing armies. Liberty of the press and freedom of speech are suppressed in exact ratio with the increase of the army.

The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HEPBURN] in his speech this afternoon referred to the fact that our standing army is not as large in proportion to population as it was in Jefferson's time, in the attempt to prove not only that this bill ought to pass, but that Thomas Jefferson was in favor of a large Army. Apparently the gentleman had forgotten that when Mr. Jefferson was President probably nine-tenths or more of what is now the United States was inhabited by roving bands of blood-thirsty savages. To assume, as several gentlemen have done, that our Army should be increased with our increase in population—in the same ratio—is simply schoolboy talk. If population were the only thing to consider, we could get along with a smaller Army now than we could have done one hundred years ago, because the danger of attack from outside nations is not so great in a country containing 75,000,000 people as it is in a country with 5,000,000 of people. In proof of this I cite you to what is about to take place in the Philippine Islands. If Aguinaldo had 75,000,000 people behind him it would not take us long to pull down the flag.

The minority report has well said that such an army as this bill provides for is not necessary because of our relations to the islands of the sea nor because of any necessity which in the past year has arisen. I can not bring myself to believe that the Administration will dare to attempt the forcible annexation of the Philippine Islands. The President himself has said that forcible annexation would be criminal aggression. But, Mr. Chairman, that was a year ago, and we are told that great changes have taken place. True, but just what day and hour forcible annexation ceased to be criminal and commenced to be the pure extract of Christian civilization our imperialistic friends fail to inform us.

Since the President wrote that message he has said the flag was planted in two hemispheres, and then he asks: "Who will pull down that flag?" So far the President's friends have failed to give a satisfactory explanation of what he meant if he did not mean that the flag which was then floating over the Philippine Islands should remain there regardless of the wishes of the Filipinos. I suppose if we had found it necessary during the late war with Spain to plant the flag in some of those countries inhabited and controlled by man-eaters it would have to stay there, and we would have to adopt those countries as a part of ours, and it would be treason to pull down the flag.

In that event, Mr. Chairman, instead of addressing the Chief Executive of this nation as "His Excellency the President of the United States," I suppose it would be appropriate to address him as "King of the Cannibal Islands." If we are yearning for an opportunity to institute better government for other people and give them the "blessings of law and liberty" at the point of the bayonet, whether they want them or not, why not exercise our civilizing process upon those who need it most? But we are told that the Filipinos are little, if any, better than cannibals. If this be true, I submit that it is an additional reason why we should not make them citizens of the United States.

I submit that our experience with the American Indians is not such as to encourage us in undertaking to civilize a people 8,000 miles away, who, according to our opponents, are much inferior and less deserving. It is an old and perhaps a true saying that "the only good Indians are dead ones." At the end of more than one hundred years' experience we find that we have civilized Lo, the poor Indian, by teaching him how to use cuss words and drink bad whisky, and incidentally convincing him that if Indian agents and Indian traders were fair samples of the white race he was justified in sending them to their "happy hunting grounds" with the least possible delay. It does seem, Mr. Chairman, that the race problem, which was so ably discussed last evening by the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. LINNEY] and which was shown to be such a perplexing one in some parts of our country, ought to be sufficient without inviting new ones of still greater magnitude.

We started the war with Spain upon a high moral plane. We declared that it was a war for human rights and not a war of conquest, but scarcely had the brave boys who fell at Santiago grown cold in death before a certain class of our citizens who represent the so-called "business interests" of the country commenced to settle upon a plan for dividing the spoils. "We have planted the flag in Manila," they said, "and the 2,000 Philippine Islands are ours."

Visions of wealth sprang up before their eyes, and the cry for liberty and independence was drowned by the more noisy and hypocritical plea for "expansion and patriotism." Those who were prompted by greed succeeded temporarily in making many who were less selfish forget the purpose for which the war was instituted. Unthinking people were carried away by the catchword "expansion." They were told by campaign orators that they must support the President's foreign "policy," though nobody knew then and nobody seems to know now what that policy is. I doubt whether he knows.

The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BROMWELL], who made one of the most convincing pleas that has been made in favor of the pending bill and in defense of the President, admitted in his speech to-day, in so many words, that the President has no policy. Nobody but MARK HANNA knows where he will stand to-morrow regarding the Philippine question. He has already been on both sides of the question. If his friends know where to find him they refuse to tell. They seem to be guessing, and I have as much right to guess as they have. My guess is that he wants to annex the islands—forcibly, if necessary—if he is assured that it will not defeat his party for reelection in 1900; otherwise he is opposed to it.

Some people indorsed his "policy" at the polls last fall without stopping to inquire what it was or whether he had any; but the war excitement is not running so high now, and as voters gradually reach a more normal state of mind they will be less inclined to accept everything as good because it is called "patriotism" and offered by a "war administration." The people are to be congratulated upon the fact that they are slowly but surely recovering from the epidemic of hysterics which in the excitement they foolishly imagined was patriotism. They are already convalescing—to use a more classical phrase, they are getting back to earth again, and when they do find themselves in a normal condition they will be ashamed of their childish talk about the flag and of their boast that we were going to take all the territory within our reach and hold fast to all we could get possession of.

Mr. Chairman, it is somewhat amusing that nearly every partisan of the Administration in this House and in the Senate who has made a speech upon this subject has advocated and argued in favor of forcible annexation, at the same time denying that the President has ever said or done anything to indicate that he was in favor of it. Following the example of their illustrious leader, they get on both sides of the proposition. If we have the right to subjugate the Filipinos, and if it is such a good thing to do, why are they so anxious to make us believe the President is not in favor of it?

They remind me of the man who was charged with stealing a bay horse, and after denying that he was guilty, said the horse he stole was a black one and not a bay horse at all. If it is such a good, Christian act, prompted only by the loftiest feelings of philanthropy—good for us and good for the Filipinos—why should the President's friends become so indignant when he is charged with favoring such a policy? Our friends on the other side should at least cultivate the virtue of consistency, in view of the fact that they are so destitute of logic and reason.

Mr. Chairman, I believe it is as true to-day as it was one hundred and twenty-three years ago that governments derive their just powers from the consent of the governed, and I do not believe that this great principle will apply only to the people of the United States. When this declaration was promulgated the so-called great statesmen of all the other nations of earth said it was the wild dream of misguided theorists and self-constituted leaders. England said, as some of us are saying of the Filipinos, that we were incapable of self-government.

We are asked now to repudiate the Declaration of Independence, and later on, I suppose, we will be expected to substitute therefor some famous Spanish state paper. Perhaps we may be asked to read at our Fourth of July celebrations in future General Weyler's reconcentrado order instead of the Declaration of Independence. If we settle upon this contemplated policy of conquest, surely no honest man would care to call attention to the immortal Declaration except as a reminder of the former greatness and goodness of the United States Government.

We are told that if we pay Spain $20,000,000 for the islands, as provided by the proposed treaty, they would be a part of our country, and we would have a perfect right to do with them as we please. Pray, sir, when did Spain acquire the right to deed us those islands? Spain has no more right to sell them than has England or China. Her title is no better than theirs. She is selling us something she has been trying for two hundred years to steal, with only partial success. To pretend to buy these islands of Spain the United States would deliberately and willingly become the receiver of stolen goods, and the receiver would be equally guilty with the thief.

Spain has been trying for hundreds of years to become the absolute master of those people. She has robbed them year in and year out to the full extent of her ability, and this proposition simply means that we are to become their masters instead of Spain. They are to become our subjects instead of the subjects of Spain, and they are not to be consulted regarding the transfer. That such a cold-blooded scheme should ever have been openly advocated by men high in the councils of our Government should bring the blush of shame to the cheek of every true American. If we insist upon this high-handed scheme of coercion we will violate every principle of self-government and repudiate every tradition we have cherished from the beginning of the nation's history.

It seems to be the policy of the Administration to give Cuba her independence. Nobody in this debate has dared to oppose it, for the reason, I suppose, that it seems to be inevitable. If the imperialists could find any excuse, and if there was a reasonable possibility of success, there is scarcely a doubt that Cuba would suffer the same fate that it is proposed to inflict upon the Philippines. And why not? The gentlemen who are so anxious for good government in the Philippines have been asked over and over again since this discussion commenced why the same rule would not apply to both. They have been urged and defied to give some reason why forcible annexation is not good for Cubans if it is good for the Filipinos, but they persist in ignoring the question, because they know there is no answer to it.

It is said the Filipinos are not capable of self-government; but it is only a cheap assertion, not borne out by any evidence presented. Let them have an opportunity, as we had, and we will know then whether they can govern themselves. Are you afraid to give them a chance for fear that they will demonstrate that you have misrepresented them? Do not say that they can not govern themselves, when you are standing over them with muskets, swearing they shall not do it. It is time enough to say they can not when they have tried and failed. You say we can give them a better government than they can give themselves. I believe we can, and possibly we would do it; but this can truthfully be said of all other countries.

There is no doubt in my mind that we could give England and France better governments than they now have. Is that any reason why we should go over there and compel them to accept our rule? Oh, you say, that is a different thing. Yes, indeed, it would be a different thing. We would then be jumping upon somebody a little nearer our size. We can conquer the Filipinos because they are weak, and in doing so we only add the crime of cowardice to the crime of theft. Because we think we have the best government on the face of the earth are we going to sail around the world subduing other nations in order that they may receive the benefits of our enlightenment and our system of government?

Are we going to cram our religion down their throats whether they want it or not, because we think it is a better religion than theirs? Why not? It will do them good, we think, and therefore we ought to make them take it. Why not gobble up one nation after another for the same reason until we own the world? That might slightly interfere with the protective tariff, but it would be Expansion with a big E, and that is only another word for patriotism.

If we must steal something, why go 8,000 miles from home to do it? Why not take in one or more of the South American Republics? They would, perhaps, be worth something to us, and we can soon make an excuse for doing it. We can plant the flag there under some pretext, and then "Who will dare to take it down?" There is no end to the possibilities—to the good we can do to other nations—if we will only carry this "expansion" policy, this new brand of "patriotism," to its legitimate conclusion. Patriotism under the old order of things, before the Declaration of Independence was expunged from the record, meant love of one's country. Under the new régime it means love for the other fellow's country.

"But what are we going to do with the Philippines?" you ask. "Are we going to turn them over to Spain?" Nobody proposes to do anything of the kind. What are we going to do with Cuba; turn it over to Spain? Gentlemen assume that we must either shoot the Filipinos or turn them over to be shot by Spaniards. It is neither necessary, humane, nor wise to do either one. Turn the islands over to the men who own them—the men who have been fighting for years, like the Cuban patriots fought, for their freedom. Do with them as we say we are going to do, and as every honest man says we ought to do, with the Cubans. The Filipinos are as well and better able to take care of themselves as they were before we took possession of Manila. We can leave them now in better condition than we found them, because we have prostrated their ancient enemy, and it is only a pretext when we say we must adopt them for their own good when they are protesting that they do not want and will not have such protection.

Even if the inhabitants of the islands were willing and anxious to come with us; even if it were not everlastingly wrong from a moral standpoint; annexation would still be unwise because of the enormous expense. These islands will cost us hundreds of dollars for every dollar we get in return. This can be demonstrated and has been demonstrated over and over again upon this floor without any attempt to refute it. But if there were "millions in it," that would not justify the outrage. No doubt there will be millions in it for a few speculators and syndicates, and these are at the bottom of the scheme of annexation. There will be Federal positions at good salaries and long-drawn-out mileage for scores of carpetbaggers, but the great mass of our people will pay the bills in increased taxation.

Forcible annexation means government without the consent of the governed; it means continued oppression to those who have so bravely fought against it; it means injustice from every standpoint; it means increased taxation; it means an increase in the standing Army; it means that we are going 8,000 miles from home to invite trouble; it means everything that is bad and nothing that is good, and it is a public confession to all the world that the war with Spain was fought under false pretenses. [Applause.]

Mr. BAKER of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, though the question before us is a very great one, I purpose being very short, for I think I can condense in few words much of the meaning of what we are about to-day.

There is now a population of about 75,000,000 people in the United States and its continental territories, and we have a permanent standing army of about 26,600 men. These are facts utterly unequaled in the entire past history of the world and constitute the crowning glory of our Republic at the close of the first and at the beginning of the second century of its existence; and nothing can be more certain than that this small permanent military force is all that is needed for our vast home population at the present time. This should be the fundamental basis of our thought in connection with the great expansion of our standing Army which is proposed by the bill before us. This proposal can not reasonably rest upon any actual internal need, but must rest upon the results of the war with Spain. That war grew out of the situation in Cuba and was prosecuted in the name of humanity and liberty, with an open declaration by our Government to the world—

That the United States hereby disclaims any disposition or intention to exercise sovereignty, jurisdiction, or control over said island, except for the pacification thereof, and asserts its determination, when that is accomplished, to leave the government and control of the island to its people.

This declaration sets the die for the whole policy of our Government in connection with all the territories wrested from Spain. In principle it applies equally to Cuba and to the Philippine Islands, for it is demanded by the republican genius of our institutions, which forbids wars of conquest and subjugation, but favors the upbuilding of popular governments among men.

Assuming, then, that we are to carry out this declaration in good faith and according to its spirit and meaning, the general situation is this: That for the purpose of pacifying the islands wrested from Spain and aiding their people to determine their own destiny in their own way, and to set up such governments for themselves as they may desire, it is assumed by the bill before us that it is necessary to make provision for the increase of the permanent standing Army of the United States to about 100,000 men.

This appears to me to be eminently unreasonable in a double sense. In the first place, the Filipinos, who are the principal subject of trouble, seem to be clamoring for the very liberty which is guaranteed by the declaration which I have quoted—that is, the liberty to organize a government for themselves. In the second place, the needed work of pacification, in preparation for the establishment of self-governments, must, in the very nature of the case, be quite limited in time, and it seems certain that any additional military force should by all means be alike limited in time. The object being accomplished, the additional force should be disbanded. These considerations appear to demonstrate that the wise thing to do is to provide for any temporary exigency which may really exist, instead of providing for a large and permanent increase of our military establishment, which will uselessly and injuriously continue after the exigency has passed.

When we add to this that the annual cost of our permanent standing Army is about $23,000,000, and that the provisions of the bill before us, according to the estimates of its friends, would increase this annual cost from nearly three times to about three and a half times the present annual cost, it appears to me that the case made out against the enactment of this measure is overwhelmingly strong, at least in the forum of reason and good public policy. I will only add that in States really free it has ever been a fundamental maxim of policy that the standing military force should be strictly limited to the actual needs of the State; and the crossing of this boundary line by the permanent military element has ever been inimical to the spirit and genius of republics. I believe that this bill proposes a great and dangerous step across this safety line, and that it should by no means be enacted into a law of our Republic. [Loud applause.]

Mr. JETT. Mr. Chairman, I now yield to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BARTLETT].

[Mr. BARTLETT addressed the committee. See Appendix.]

Mr. JETT. I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. MADDOX].

[Mr. MADDOX addressed the committee. See Appendix.]

Mr. JETT. I now yield to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. NORTON].

Mr. NORTON of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, I desire to protest against the passage of the Hull bill, not because I am opposed to a standing army in the United States, for I have an admiration and a love for all the institutions of my country, and I would protect them from the defiling hand of any other nation and from destruction by internal foes. I have an admiration for the Regular Army, and I fear that the American people have more admiration for the Regular Army at this time than some of the generals of the Regular Army have for themselves. At this hour, Mr. Chairman, when the eyes of America are turned to the capital, waiting and listening for the result of a court-martial, it does not become gentlemen upon the other side of the House to glorify and exalt the Regular Army as the only hope and safeguard of the American people.

I love the institution at West Point. I glory in the men that she has sent out from her doors. I love the Academy at Annapolis, and I am as proud of her graduates as any man living. But I love the American people too, and I love the boys upon the farm, and those in the factories and shops, who volunteered; and when I think of the hours they have just passed in misery, in bloodshed, in trial and tribulation, I know the volunteer to be equally as great and equally as grand as the man who has been educated at either of those institutions. [Applause.] A man may die an educated soldier, but his pain is no greater to him than to one who dies because he has come from the farm or the workshop at the call of his country. I look upon the Regular Army in admiration, but I look upon the volunteers with love and amazement, and I wonder that such things can be in any spot on God's green earth, where he comes at his country's call, asking no pay, ready at all times to yield up his life and to stand side by side with those who make war the calling and business of their lives.

Mr. Chairman, there is no good in casting aspersions upon either of these. You need only a standing army of men sufficient to guard your ports, your coast lines, and your outposts, if you will generate an honest, heartfelt patriotism, such as you had at the breaking out of the war with Spain. Our present Regular Army is large enough, but if you conduct your wars in the manner in which that war was conducted, then patriotism will be dead; if you should call to-night for a hundred thousand men, it would require not the opening of the doors for enlistment, but it would require enforced enlistment. You speak of that war as glorious and honorable. Yes, victories were won at Manila, at Santiago, and at San Juan, but Spain won her victory in Paris; and well has one of her commissioners said that "the Philippines will avenge Spain."

The hour has come when that prophecy is upon the floor of this House confronting you as a deliberate fact. You commenced this war not for acquisition. You upon that side of the House say that "the king can do no wrong." If that be true, then his words ought to be words of truth and soberness. In the very opening of this Congress the President advised you that forced aggression and annexation were criminal and disgraceful in the eyes of the world and against the moral policy of our Government and our nation. Yet to-night the very reason that you are discussing this measure is that you may have power to force annexation.

When the Senate shall have ratified the treaty, what have they done? They have belied the words of the President of the United States before the world, and they will have consummated an act that he charged as being "criminal" and against the whole theory and moral principles of our Government. You have taken the Philippines by force, and then, by strategy and bargaining such as was beneath the dignity of diplomacy, you paid twenty millions of the people's money for them, and now demand an army of 100,000 men to force that whole bargain through. I say that it is disgraceful, and I say that section of the treaty which, when ratified, makes necessary the use of arms to forcibly annex the Philippines is not less than what the President declared it to be—criminal. [Applause.]

You have assumed $100,000,000 in the payment of personal indebtedness. You want to take $20,000,000 of the people's money to pay for the Philippines. You have gone along with a war more expensive than was ever waged since the world began, and in one hundred and three days you spent more money—and I say it fearlessly upon this floor—you scattered the people's money unreasonably and unnecessarily; and the victory you bring back to us is that we assume Spain's indebtedness, assume the transportation of her soldiers back to her territory, and then raise a standing army to shoot down the Filipinos, because they have that same spirit which we claim for ourselves—the love of human liberty.

You say that Aguinaldo is a thief. If he be a thief, Dewey took him from Hongkong and placed him in the Philippines. You say he is a traitor; if he is a traitor, you placed 80,000 stand of arms belonging to the United States in the hands of a traitor. You loved Aguinaldo when he was necessary. If men with freedom in their hearts and courage in their veins go back into the islands and stand and suffer and die, they are men; but the moment that you accomplished what we started to do—to give freedom to Cuba—no, you did not accomplish that—(while you were pretending your love for the glory of my country, reaching out its hands for the starving Cubans, Dewey struck at the Philippines, and from that hour there was not a reconcentrado ever received a cracker from the United States)—when you no longer needed the aid of the insurgents, then they were rebels and traitors.

It would have been better for my country, more honorable for my flag, if when Dewey had sunk to the bottom of the ocean that Spanish fleet, he had sailed away and moored in front of Morro Castle, where the pledges of the President of the United States to his people expected him to be—to do what? To establish peace and order and a stable government in Cuba. You have not only bought the Philippines, but you have assumed the Philippine indebtedness. Think of the glory of this war. Yes, the men—veterans and the volunteers, God bless them!—they will live forever in the memory of my country; but when that war had been honorably closed by them and Spain was upon her knees, think of what followed then!

Who came to our doors then? The agents of Spain and the representatives of the owners of the Cuban bonds. What followed then? Then came a peace commission of five Spaniards and five Americans. In common decency I beg that you may forget it, and that the people of my country may not remember the shame of that. Why, think of this peace commission bartering and bargaining! Spain was upon her knees. Why not, like Emperor William, when he had conquered France and placed the German eagle over Paris, lay down your terms—"A thousand millions, Alsace and Lorraine, and you have nothing to say about it"?

Why did not we, having this victory, which we ought to have won, not in the name of humanity, but because of insult to the flag, the murder of our citizens, the destruction of our property, the blowing up of the Maine, every principle that ought to actuate a brave nation had been outraged; and yet upon the pitiful plea for humanity, humanity that stirs every human heart that can be reached by humanity. This whole movement, which had been dictated by the patriotism of the American people, inspired the President, whom I believe to be honest, but it has been manipulated upon the political chessboard of the Republican party from start to finish; and what is it to-day that is invoked? It is not patriotism, it is not love of country, but solely for the aggrandizement and indorsement of the Republican party in its doctrine of imperialism. [Loud applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. Chairman, I do not fear the destruction of this great American Republic as an immediate result of the annexation of the Philippine Islands, if such an event shall take place, even though the history of the past shows the extreme likelihood of that being the finale of such a course. Experience is far safer to rely upon than popular clamor, and experience justifies my belief; therefore I am not moved by the hysterical ravings or extravagant claims and denunciations of wild-eyed, demagogic expansionists, who even try to drive aside those who, while agreeing with them, seek to maintain their position by reason and logic. In opposing the adoption of an imperialistic expansion policy by my Government I am not attempting to turn back the hands of the clock of destiny, but, rather, to brush away, as far as in my power, the obstacles to the advance of liberty and freedom placed there by these expansionists.

The lessons of history, all down through the ages, go to establish the fact that it has not been vast accumulation of wealth, not aggregation or centralization of military force and power, that has created and maintained the supremacy of any nation, but that the character of its people has ever been the foundation stone upon which their fate has rested. The true Americanism of those who are not carried away with enthusiasm, or who do not lose their balance by the quick-moving and ever-shifting scenes of war and its attendant excitement and resultant consequences, will be recognized when the people have taken their sober second thought and calmly and dispassionately reviewed existing facts.

Believing as I do in the patriotism, the honest integrity, and sterling character of the people of the United States, I am content to leave my justification in their hands, knowing well that when they come to a full realization of the condition sought to be imposed upon them, there will be no faltering or hesitation on their part, but they will speak in no uncertain tones, and woe be to the man or measure they condemn.

There is great satisfaction in fighting for right principle, even though temporary defeat be certain and sure. It is far better and more glorious to stand for truth and justice and lose, than to temporize with wrong and win, for eventually principle and right must win, as they are based on the eternal truths of God.

Political history, as shown in the birth, rise, and fall of parties as well as of governments, has ever demonstrated the fact, though, that something besides high and lofty ideals, generous, noble, and humanitarian motives, is employed to bring results sought to be accomplished. If in this late war the principle laid down at its beginning, that we were "entering upon a struggle solely in behalf of outraged humanity"—if, I say, this principle could have been conscientiously carried out, we to-day would not have the vexing questions to solve that are now thrust upon us; but the truth is, that idea, that pronunciamento, was but a juggle with words, a mask used to hide and conceal the real designs of crafty men, who found in the war an opportunity to enrich themselves at the expense of the Government.

The great heart of the American people was right; it was touched by the terrible suffering of an oppressed people; the balmy breezes that were wafted northward from Cuban shores bore on their wings the moans and groans of dying patriots and the shrieks of female virtue outraged by Spanish soldiery, while the sky was darkened by the smoke of burning homes and factories laid waste by the devastating torch of Spanish authorities. These all appealed to our liberty-loving people, and voicing their feelings, we, their Representatives, on this side of the Chamber pleaded that the struggling Cubans be given recognition. Had this been done the Spanish yoke would have been broken, the heel of Spanish oppression would have been removed from the neck of Cuban patriots, and Cuba would have been free, without the loss of the Maine, and without the necessity of a war that has extended our national debt the life of another generation, as well as carried sorrow and woe to the hearthstones of thousands of American homes, laid thousands of the brave, stalwart sons of our country in martyrs' graves, and shattered forever the health of thousands more by the gross negligence and criminal incompetency of officials in charge. [Applause.]

But that war is over, and it is meet and fitting that a survey of the situation be taken to know what we have gained and what confronts us, especially as we are called upon to legislate to meet the new conditions forced upon us, conditions that for good or for evil are in our immediate present and must be met. In this bill there is proposed to us the adoption of a policy which not only leads us away from the principles upon which our Government was founded, away from the teachings and traditions of our fathers, but is in direct contravention of all the ideas laid down as safe landmarks by all our statesmen down to this last régime, a policy which not alone affects the present with dire and portentous evils that alarm every true minded, conservative, and patriotic lover of his country, but the results of which will reach out, extending into the future, imposing upon our children and our children's children a malignant incubus that will crush every spark of hope from their lives, and consign the American freeman to the bondage of despotism and render him the serf or the subservient tool of an imperial oligarchy, which already seeks to bring under its damning control these United States.

The United States to-day as a nation has no equal. It is the wonder of the age. In all that goes to build up a great nation it stands without a peer. Its foundation stones rest deep on the bed rock of national honor and the intense loyalty of the people. On its highest pinnacles floats the Stars and Stripes, the emblem of human liberty and freedom. Its growth has been phenomenal, and the wildest flights of imagination are but nothing compared with the marvelous achievements our energy, our inventive ingenuity, our wondrous ability, and the development of our boundless resources have already shown, and still there is the promise yet to produce realizations almost beyond the power of the human mind to conceive; but this has been the result of the freedom of our people.

The corner stone of our Republic is the individual as a sovereign. This being the fact, the question must occur upon the addition of any new peoples to our Government, do the individuals among these peoples possess the proper and necessary attributes and qualifications of individual sovereignty? If they do, then they can be annexed with safety, other things being of such nature as to render it politic; but if they do not, then the annexation of such peoples, they becoming sovereigns with us by such annexation, must weaken our whole Government to the extent that they are weak. So well was this understood by the framers of our Constitution that they inserted a clause in that instrument providing for a restriction upon the influx of foreign immigration, to stop the addition of new peoples to our population, and it is a matter of fact that we have been compelled to legislate for the shutting out of dangerous elements from other nations, and have passed the Chinese-exclusion and the alien-labor acts.

In our development as a nation the greatest strides have been taken during the past generation. When the fearful gale and tremendous surge of the storm of civil strife in our land was ended and the rainbow of peace bedecked the political sky, when our united country was freed from the blighting curse of negro slavery, then the genius of liberty found full expression, progress, commercial enterprise, inventive thought, and intellectual activity leaped ahead as never had entered the wildest dream of the most enthusiastic prophet. Our growth was but the logical development of the fact that our nation's grandeur is based upon the high moral character of its people.

Mr. Chairman, we have entered upon a period in our nation's history fraught with grave results, threatening its progress and challenging its perpetuity. It is well, in the light of recent history, to look with critical gaze upon the policy of the Administration and its friends in regard to the course to which it is sought to commit us. The suspicious delay that has attended every move made during the past year has given just cause to every true, patriotic citizen to examine closely into its recommendations. Democratic opposition has not been based on factious partisan feeling or prejudice, but upon the fear, justified by results, that the Republican policy would be a base surrender of the rights of the people to designing syndicates who would force countless schemes for their own aggrandizement upon the Government, and at the expense of the people.

The proposal of a standing Army of 100,000 men means an expenditure of over $150,000,000 additional each year, which is but an incident in the scheme they have in hand. This feature alone means that the present war-revenue tax will not be repealed, but that in time of peace the tax will be increased. This is to maintain the power of the military government in the islands abroad, that the valuable rights and franchises of these lands may be bartered away under direction of high officials who arrogate to themselves rights and functions wholly outside those given them by law and whose only check is the limit their insatiate greed can obtain. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, there is danger ahead. The watchman on the tower, the lookout at the masthead, he who looks with prophetic vision into the future history of nations, has caught a glimpse of the huge and fearful doom that lies before us. Senator Morrill, crowned with long years of ripe experience and rare wisdom, standing even then on the borderland of the beyond, gave to his countrymen ere he passed over into the summerland of a bright and glorious hereafter, this message of warning, these words of wise admonition:

> We can not afford to denounce and forbid all acquisitions of territory in the Western Hemisphere by European governments, even at the peril of war, and forthwith embark in a thus be-damned enterprise ourselves. If our fidelity to the well-ripened statesmanship of the Father of his Country shall be perpetuated for the next hundred years as in the past, the honor, prosperity, and power of our Republic, it may safely be predicted, will light and lead all nations.

And ex-Senator Sherman joins:

> I do not hesitate to state that this expansion business will ruin the American people, and that the extravagance of the Administration will ruin the Republican party. Just think of it! The debt of the country has been increased within the last few months $200,000,000. I had hoped to live to see the entire civil-war debt wiped out. I have no hope of that now.

Then listen to Hon. George S. Boutwell:

> The President proposes to take jurisdiction of the Philippines and then consider how they are to be governed. Thus he announces the essential doctrine of an unlimited tyranny. We are to pursue the policy which we condemned in Spain and which has ended in unmitigated disaster.

Clear-headed and wise-reasoning Senator HOAR says:

> My opinion is, that if the United States acquire the Philippine Islands, to govern them as a subject or vassal state, the destruction of the American Republic will date from the administration of William McKinley.

Then, too, there is the utterance of President McKinley in a message sent to this body within the last twelve months, and one which is a strange and striking commentary on proceedings now taking place and conditions sought to be fastened upon this country by a band of conspirators:

> I speak not of forcing annexation, for that can not be thought of. That by our code of morality would be criminal aggression.

These are but a few of the danger signals raised before us, but they present truths that it were well for this country to heed, even if they do emphasize the utter inconsistency of the Republican party. The good of our country is at stake, and should be considered, whatever may be the result to the coterie directing the affairs of the Administration. Presidents come and go, and are soon forgotten, but the country remains, and all legislation should be for the preservation of its liberties and the perpetuity of its free institutions.

The Republican policy of expansion, that of extending our Government over distant provinces inhabited by an entirely different race, a race of savage and semi-civilized people, means a government by force of an unwilling people, "criminal aggression" in reality, and the necessary enlargement of our standing Army. The first call is for 100,000 men; but when these are scattered in the various parts of the globe there will come the call for more, and again the Army must needs be strengthened and increased. How will we secure the men to fill the demand? In the light of the disclosures and revelations made of the conduct of this last war, the treatment of the private soldiers, the subordination of their welfare and comfort to the greed and profit of heartless contractors and inefficient officials at the head of important departments, given their authority by this Administration on the principle of toadyism and favoritism—in the face of all this, there would be but a tardy response to a call for volunteers, and a system of conscription would be forced upon our country to raise the required levy.

Where will they be needed? Surely not in Porto Rico. A few hundred troops will be amply sufficient for that vassal isle of ours. Not in Cuba, for those who are best posted in the internal affairs of Cuba inform us that 10,000 of our troops are more than enough to insure the speedy formation of a "stable government" in Cuba. Shall they be sent to the Philippines? If they go there to forcibly annex that island territory, it is true they must go in force and remain there for years, subject to all the deteriorating influences of the worst phases of the hell of war. The history of English troops in these tropical stations, among half-civilized races, has been one of the most awful and terrible degradation of their moral, physical, and social conditions. To send the gallant troops of America to those climes would be to send them to the fountain head of physical corruption and vice, which would communicate its evil results to the third and fourth generations. But this is not the true reason. These additional men are not needed abroad. Before the war with Spain our Regular Army consisted of some 28,000 men, and was amply sufficient to protect every interest in all our vast domain; and surely twice that many men are not honestly needed to assist the people in territory no greater than Texas to form a "stable" government.

There is an ulterior motive in the minds of those who are planning all this, and urging upon the Administration expansion as an argument for a large standing Army. The liberties of the people are endangered; the foundations of our Government are being assailed; deep mines are laid to encompass the downfall of the Republic. The annexation of the island of Sardinia to the Republic of Rome was the first act in the downfall and destruction of the Republic, and marked the beginning of the Empire. The annexation of the Philippines gives the conspirators the opportunity to ask for a large standing Army, to be used as the nucleus of a military despotism. As an entering wedge, the Executive now has and seeks to prolong a military government in all our vassal and occupied territory abroad, while the Secretary of War takes upon himself the parceling out of rights, grants, privileges, and franchises with all the independence of a military dictator.

Soon we will have a horde of hired professional soldiers, perhaps recruited from the savage tribes among the Filipinos, wholly out of sympathy with the American people and American interests, at the behest of the bosses; there will be the gradual restriction and the final abolition of the elective franchise by the employment of Federal bayonets at the polls; the complete subjugation of labor, the suppression of unions or labor organizations, the complete disregard of constitutional rights, and a government without the consent of the governed. All this is in their plan; and then follows the full military dictatorship, the Republic perishes, the empire is enthroned, while the syndicates rejoice and profit by the possession of gain their ill-begotten schemes have brought to them. [Applause.]

For expansion, on their terms, they bring into play glittering generalities, catch phrases, and fine words, but utterly ignore plain practical argument.

They propose to annex and bring into our domain and as part of our dominion over 8,000,000 Malays and Negritos, races wholly alien and incapable of assimilation with our race and form of government. Throughout all the years of our history we have proclaimed our right to the title of being the land of the free, the refuge of the downtrodden, the asylum for the oppressed of every clime, and to our shores have come English, Irish, French, German, Jew and Gentile, Greek and barbarian, from nearly every land, but when have we ever had any immigration from the Philippines? When have any of the lusty sons of Luzon or Mindanao displayed their Adamite forms on America's soil, except perchance as they may have disported on the gay Midway during the World's Fair?

What folly to think of Americanizing these cannibalistic sea islanders. And unless they were brought into full understanding and comprehension of our institutions and an appreciation of the beneficent results attendant upon their preservation, it would be suicidal policy on our part to bring them in. Why are these Republican schemers so anxious now for annexation? Let me recall how, in days past, Canada, Mexico, Yucatan, Cuba, Hayti, and San Domingo knocked at our door for admission into our Union or annexation as provinces, and the Republican party said them "nay." Let me remind you how for years you have faced the immigration question, and insisted that there shall not come to our shores from civilized Caucasian Europe any who can not read a few lines of our Constitution, and now propose to open wide your arms and admit with loving embrace and make citizens of the wild and naked savages of the Orient.

This nation, with all its glory and grand achievements, has not yet learned how to deal with the race question within the confines of our present territory. Our conduct toward the American Indian shows this. The hundred years of our treatment of them has fittingly been characterized as a "century of dishonor," and our "humanitarian" policy has reduced their number from a score of millions to less than a quarter of a million, while in Alaska, another place where our humanitarian process has been in operation but comparatively a few years, but a feeble remnant of a once flourishing native population remains. Then take the negro race. We have not learned the alpha of our duties toward them, or the beginning of the solution of the problem their presence among us creates. Faulty and blamable as the Democratic party may be in this respect, its record gleams in snow-white purity when contrasted with the hypocrisy, the systematic betrayal of trust and base ingratitude of the Republican party toward that race.

If, then, this nation has so completely failed in its duty to its wards and fellow-citizens at home, what can we expect it to accomplish in the uplifting of thrice their number who are possessed of not one-third their natural endowment and civilization?

The expansionists speak of destiny, and a Providence that opens the way to the salvation of the heathen in the "isles of the sea," forgetting or ignoring the grander opportunity for their missionary zeal afforded by the "heathen nearer home." They hurl their taunts at patriotic citizens who do not see the leading of "manifest destiny" in crooked schemes, or believe that Divine Providence has revealed His plans to a band of corrupt political conspirators. They ask if we wish our country to remain a "hermit" and an "isolated" nation, and then declare "we are coming to our own; we are stretching out our hands for what nature meant should be ours; we are taking our proper rank among the nations of the earth."

What senseless bombast; how false and utterly misleading! If we should become a hermit or isolated nation, it would simply be for the reason that we stand so much the higher, on so much superior a plane than any other nation that there would be none that could rank in the same class with us. [Applause.] The United States a hermit nation! From the uttermost parts of the earth there comes to our domain people to do us homage and pay us tribute. Science, art, manufacture, commercial enterprise, all have from our land dominated conditions everywhere. Our political influence is recognized wherever there is a government on the face of the globe.

"Coming to our own, and taking what nature meant should be ours." When were the Philippines ever our own? By what manner of descent do we come into them as a heritage? By what right do we acquire title? Not by conquest, for we have neither conquered them nor have we the right to do so, for it was most solemnly proclaimed that this was not a war of conquest, but of humanity, so that, in keeping with the pronouncements of this Administration and its friends, we can not take them by conquest, and even as a matter of fact, we have not captured or conquered them. Dewey with his fleet remains at Manila, tied up by cable instructions from vacillating Washington, and the control by American power extends no farther than the guns of Dewey's fleet will carry. Spain can not give us a clear title, for her own title rested on no good tenure. It is only by the most exaggerated development of the Darwinian theory that there could be found a conception to serve as the foundation for this crazy freak of a notion, and our only claim to a title comes to us through our relationship by the remote but common origin of species. If nature intended the Philippines to be ours, why were they planted 7,500 miles away, instead of at our shores? Out upon such foolish assumptions. [Applause.]

We are told by these leaders, these syndicate bankers, that American commerce needs new markets, and only expansion of territory in the direction of Malaydom can open new markets for us. In what way can American control of these islands create trade for us? The people there are not people who would buy anything of us. Compare them with civilized folk. Canada, last year, with 5,000,000 population, bought over $85,000,000 of our goods, while the whole oceanic archipelago, including the Philippines, with over 20,000,000 inhabitants, bought of us $162,446 of our products and manufactures. If we want to extend our trade and open new markets by the annexation process let us proceed on a common-sense basis and annex first Canada, and then take in everything from "Greenland's icy mountains" to Patagonia's rocky shores.

We can not ship the products of our farms to Manila, even using that as a base of supplies for China and Japan, for the freight charges are so high that it would be impossible for the American farmer to compete successfully with the farmer of Australia or India. Last year the records show we purchased from the Philippines $4,982,857. Now, contrast this with the increased cost of maintaining a large standing Army, the swelling of the pension roll, all the added expense of the Navy, and the civil administration list, and tell me, Where is the gain? Against the imperial Republican doctrine of expansion, the head of the largest iron manufacturing concern in the world and the largest exporter of goods in the United States says: "I know that the acquiring of the Philippines would be detrimental to commercial expansion." We have no need, however, of enlarging our borders. Mr. Carnegie says:

> Without distant possessions the Republic, solid, compact, safe from the zone of war disturbance, has captured the world's markets for many products and only needs a continuance of peaceful conditions to have the industrial world at its feet.

It is admitted by the advocates of expansion that peaceful conditions will not prevail, but that we would more than likely become involved in war. Already there is talk of the "next great war." It is urged that we must mix in the turbulent conditions of the East in order that we may take our proper rank among the nations of the earth; that we must let the people of this country feel the advancing waves and be swept into the eddying currents of direst want and woe, in which the Old World has been tossed and whirled for ages. I for one do not want such to be the doom of my countrymen. I am opposed to entanglement or alliance with any other nation, and no one denies that we would be compelled to form alliances with some of the powers of the East if we enter upon this imperialistic plan of colonial expansion, and compelled to share in international complications.

A few years ago, when the Democratic party was laboring for tariff reform and seeking to provide a system of revenue that would have permitted a degree of prosperity to have become a reality in our country, the Republicans shouted that we were copying English free trade, and England was held up as a bugaboo to frighten voters away from the Democratic party. But for years the hand that has pulled the strings and moved Republican puppets has been an English hand, and to-day it is because the English head of the syndicate prompts the move that the Republican is favoring expansion.

We as a nation do not want any alliance with, nor do the people wish to be used as a catspaw of, England. The diplomacy of England has always been against American interests and against the true welfare of this country.

Scarce a generation ago, during our civil war, to go no further back, England, as in all her history, was against the Union and did all in her power without open declaration, to effect our ruin. In her shipyards were fitted out cruisers to prey upon and destroy our commerce; blockade runners carried arms, ammunition, and supplies to the South, and while in this way assisting it, at the same time robbed it of the stores of cotton raised on its soil. No alliance with a nation whose entire history has been in entire keeping and perfect accord with her conduct toward us while we were still British colonies! To-day the dealings of England with Ireland are sufficient to justify our intervention on humanitarian grounds. No; let us have no alliance with any nation. Let us hold fast to the admonition of Washington and not "quit our own to stand on foreign ground." England is anxious that we annex the Philippines so that she may hold over us the threat that if we do not yield to her commercial demands, she will take these islands away from us or compel us to fight.

Beware of the hungry lion
Whenever he speaks you well;
His words are fair, at the mouth of his lair,
And as smooth as the road to hell.
But his deeds are dark and dastard,
And his thoughts are of his maw;
And his chops dip red with the blood he's shed,
And greed is his only law.

The Democratic party has ever advocated the doctrine of "no entangling alliances with foreign powers," it has always been the party of high and noble principle, and is to-day the party standing for the interests of the people, and I am standing on Democratic principles when I declare that imperialistic expansion is repugnant and abhorrent to true Americanism.

We need no colonies. There are countless acres in every State of the Union undeveloped. Within an hour's ride of this Capitol there is room for a thousand more farmers to bring under subjection idle and unimproved ground, and between the two oceans lies an enormous territory, whose natural resources are unequaled, and capable of supporting the entire population of the civilized world.

According to the census of 1850 there were then 180,528,000 acres of unimproved land embraced within farms in the United States. In 1890 there were 265,601,864. This does not include wild land. At the rate that land has been cultivated for the past forty years, it would take two hundred years for the land fenced in as farms in the United States to be cultivated as closely as the land in Porto Rico is now.

Taking a dozen countries, we have a population to the square mile as follows:

Saxony	605
Belgium	551
Great Britain	315
Italy	278
Prussia	223
Porto Rico	212
Austria	206
France	188
Spain	88
Philippines	66
Cuba	32
United States	21

This shows that the Philippines already support a population three times as dense as that of the United States, and that we have no surplus population that we need an outlet for, and we have abundant room without annexing foreign acres to cultivate. Let us develop our own land, open the mines, till the farms, start the mills and shops closed by the blighting policy of the Republican party, which is now preaching imperial expansion. If we do this, we will have in addition to the foreign market, the foreign trade we can scarcely satisfy now, an increased and enlarged home market, and we shall find in this fair land of ours the best and grandest spot on earth for the employment of our capital and labor.

The leaders among the laboring people in their conventions and deliberative assemblies have ranged themselves against expansion as being opposed to their interests. These are the men who represent the American laborer, possessing the intelligence and recognizing the wants of a high civilization, and ready at all times to join hands with that commercial enterprise which would lead us to and maintain us in the business supremacy of the globe.

The Central Labor Union of New York thus puts itself on record:

Resolved, That we are opposed by every means within the Constitution to the policy of imperialism and expansion beyond the limits of this continent and the islands that are within its natural and legitimate sphere of influence, and every other form of expansion everywhere not in strict accord with the Declaration of Independence. * * *

Resolved, That we indorse the preservation of the wise and time-attested policy of George Washington of avoiding all entangling alliances with European powers, and especially all alliances or undertakings looking to joint action with England, that might involve the United States in territorial, commercial, or other disputes between powers of the Old World.

The laboring people of my own district are opposed to expansion. My mail is full of protests, individually and in collective bodies. Union No. 79, the Cigar Makers' Union of America, at Sandusky, Ohio, adopted these resolutions:

We do most emphatically protest against the annexation of the Philippines. We are opposed to any foreign expansion policy, believing in self-government and against any acquisition of new territory.

The interests of every American industry are in direct antagonism to the annexation of the Philippines. There is no sentiment in trade; people buy and sell where they can do the best. Trade does not follow the flag. The shrieking of silly, addle-pated individuals about commerce and the flag going hand in hand betrays the ignoramus who knows nothing of the methods of commerce. The trade of nations is the same as the trade of individuals, and goes where it can obtain the greatest advantage and profit. Wild talk about the flag does not indicate any special degree of patriotism, and the declarations made that the flag will never be hauled down where it has once been raised excite the smile of pity from those conversant with the history of our country and its flag. On the opening day of this year of our Lord the Stars and Stripes were raised at Havana, and for several months our flag has floated over Santiago, and yet by the solemn pledge of this Government it must be hauled down when Cuba has a "stable" government, and there are a score of instances in our history where Old Glory has been raised and hauled down again.

It swings to the breeze at Manila at the masthead of Dewey's ship and over the barracks of our troops, but there will be no stain, no dishonor to it if it should leave those waters, flying over the heads of our soldiers and marines as they come back to their native shores. I do not want the flag to stay there. I prefer to have the American flag—the flag of my country, the flag for which I fought, the flag which stands the emblem of hope and freedom, the banner of a united people—I prefer rather to see that flag float over my native land, where its pure folds may be kissed by the soft breezes of liberty, rather than have it stained by raising it as the insignia of the slave driver's power over savage slaves! [Applause.]

The test of civilization is the substitution of law for war, courts for brute strength, right for might; and what a travesty on civilization, on all law, justice, and right is the assumption of our sovereignty over 10,000,000 people whose consent we have not secured, or even asked, when our own Government is founded on the principle that "all government should derive its just power from the consent of the governed." It is time that the Declaration of Independence should be reread and studied by some of our people. It is true that the Republican party in its latter-day policy and practice pays not the slightest attention to the interest of the people. It has wandered away from the ideas and principles upon which it was founded, and directs all legislation along the lines of subserviency to the dictates of organized avarice and greed. For years it has sought to bring about the centralization of power in the hands of the Federal Government. In 1868 there was started in the city of New York a paper called The Imperialist, through which advocates of this scheme for the destruction and overthrow of democratic institutions might give expression to their views and rally those in sympathy with them.

For a while it worked independently, but at last suspended, giving as its reason that "owing to the love of the people for the Constitution, the Imperialists could accomplish their designs better through the Republican party," and the Republicans have continually shown that such is the object at which they are aiming.

They have sought to maintain a Federal force around the ballot box and thus prevent the free expression of the will of the people at the polls; they tampered with the courts and prostituted justice to base ends and the subversion of the rights of American labor; they have placed the burden of taxation upon the shoulders of the poor and the working classes, absolving the corporations and the wealth of the nation from bearing their just share; they robbed the people of their money and doubled the load of indebtedness under which the nation already groaned.

The per capita expense of government depends upon the density of population, and is greater in sparsely settled countries than in those that are thickly settled. When the United States was sparsely settled, the expenditures for Federal purposes varied from $1.35 per capita to $2.20, which was the highest point reached prior to 1860. As our country increased in population the expenditures, instead of decreasing, increased, until now, with the most economical administration of affairs, it requires $5 per capita, while the average is above that sum. The per capita expenses of the United States are already in excess of those of any other nation. The German Empire, including the municipal expenses, has a per capita of $5.90; the British Empire, including colonial expenses, $2.97; Russia, $2.75; Mexico, $3.85; Japan, $1.60; Austria has $1.51; Portugal, $1.08; China has only 19 cents, while the United States has a Federal expense of $5, and including State expenditures mounts up to $14.10 per capita.

By the extravagance and abuses that have crept into the administration of public affairs under Republican management the people of the United States are taxed from three to four times more heavily than the people of any other government. The masters of the Republican party dictated the nomination of their candidate for President, and by the expenditure of a vast corruption fund, reaching into millions, by bribery, coercion, and fraud, they elected him. They saw in this war an opportunity to further enrich themselves, and they kept back the declaration, retarded its conclusion until their plans were perfected, and now, under cover of the war necessities and results, seek to fasten upon this country a standing army of from 100,000 men to no one knows how many more, and their tools and organs all over the land cry out against anyone who dares to call a halt or suggest a doubt as to the expediency or wisdom of the measure, and denounce them as traitors and maniacs. [Applause.]

All through the campaign of 1898 Republican speakers and the parrot Republican press boiled over with the maudlin stock phrases, "Stand by the President," "Hold up the hands of the Administration," and the same cries are now ringing through the land. We are willing and ready at all times to stand by the President whenever he will declare a policy, if it is right and is on the side of the patriot and freeman. We are willing to help hold up the hands of the Administration, but we want him to turn the open palm of his hand in friendship toward the American people, not with clenched fist to strike down their interests. Let him be open and frank toward the people; let him declare his policy in regard to the Philippines; and if in harmony with principles of right and justice, we will stand by him and hold up his hands as long as his most ardent supporter in the land.

We do not, however, propose to sacrifice our independence as Representatives, members of a coordinate branch of the Government, or crawl in obsequious or abject slavery at the behest and dictation of the masters of this Administration. We have the right on this question to ask, Can we afford it? The annexation of the Philippines, the establishment of a colonial system with our Republic, is used as an argument for the need of a large standing army. It would increase our per capita tax. With our already large pension list, it would cost for our military establishment over $295,000,000 per annum, even without taking into consideration the Navy expenses.

In addition to this we would be forced to the assumption of over $8,000,000 of Spanish bonds issued for the improvement of Manila Harbor. In 1892 the Spanish debt was funded, and to guarantee the payment of that debt the resources of all her colonies were pledged, and the proportion of the Philippines was over $8,000,000. We have declared our position on this question. When Mr. Adams was Secretary of State, August 10, 1818, he instructed Mr. Everett:

> No principle of international law can be more clearly established than this, that the rights and obligations of a nation in regard to other states are independent of its internal revolutions of government. It extends even to the case of conquest. The conquerors who reduce a nation to their subjection receive it subject to all its engagements and duties toward others, the fulfillment of which then becomes their own duty.

Article VII of the Paris treaty provides: "The United States will adjudicate and settle the claims of its citizens against Spain relinquished in this article." Under this clause for damages to personal property alone the United States has assumed a liability of $100,000,000. If Spain could be whipped about three times on the same terms, she would be free from debt and could resume her former grandeur. About three more such victories would make our public debt greater than it has ever been in the history of our nation. Spain receives directly $120,000,000 and probably $430,000,000 more on the bonds, and virtually but two battles were fought.

Now, we have to bear a tariff law, a "protective" tariff, which is producing even in these days of boasted "prosperity" an increasing deficit each month—a tariff which its friends make no pretensions of its bringing in sufficient revenues upon a peace basis and without a colony. What will be the result with increased expenditures and decreasing importations, and decreased receipts at the custom-house? It will force our Republican friends to the adoption of the "unconstitutional" income tax. We have also the policy or suggestion from this Republican Administration of an "open door," that all nations shall be entitled to an equal chance to the trade of these islands, while our Constitution provides that there shall be uniformity in excises, imposts, and duties everywhere within the domain of the United States.

We also have to consider the objection of the Filipinos to our sovereignty. A peculiar situation is before us. The insurgents of Luzon have an organized government; its armies have been in actual warfare against Spain; thousands of prisoners have been taken and are now held; cities have been besieged and Spanish troops compelled to surrender. Now, in direct violation of the Constitution, with unwarranted usurpation of power and authority, the President steps within the exclusive province of Congress and directs our Army and Navy to make war upon this Philippine government, a government de facto, no matter how crude or incomplete. This, though, is in perfect keeping with the tenets of the Republican party ever since the present leaders thereof obtained recognition in its counsels through the death of patriotic statesmen who once were at its head. The Philippines, the Hawaiians, and the Cubans are to be trampled under foot by the administration of HANNA, Alger, and others, carrying out the dictates of the Republican lords; the Spanish-Cuban bondholders are to be placed in charge, and the Spanish yoke exchanged for Republican chains, under guise of military law and beneath the American flag. [Applause.] The Army of the United States will be used to enforce the carrying out of these schemes, and the stalwart sons of America will be drafted to do police duty and act as tax collectors in the fever-infected climes, and the expense will be gathered from the sweat and toil of American labor.

The anti-American, unpatriotic syndicates controlling the Republican party govern and direct the actions of its members, as was shown when, by an indelicate exposure of the operation of his mind, one of their oracles exclaimed, "You may stand by the law if you will, but I prefer to stand by the friends who stood by me;" and so whatever this gigantic combination of syndicates that stood by them by contributing their millions to the success of the Republican party and the election of its candidate as President—whatever this octopus directs the Republican partisans are ready to stand by and uphold.

They seek, however, by glib, high-sounding phrases to deceive the people. "Military government," "commercial expansion," "manifest destiny," "lifting Old Glory a little higher," "the ways of Providence"—these are expressions they roll like a sweet morsel under their tongues to conceal their schemes, but—

> In vain they call old notions fudge,
> And give to sin some other name;
> The Ten Commandments will not budge,
> And stealing is stealing just the same.

And that is exactly what the Republican policy means, the wholesale plundering of the colonies abroad and the robbing of the Republic at home. It was officially announced some years ago by one high in Republican councils that "the Ten Commandments have no place in politics," and in perfect accord with that statement has been the Republican course, until it has laid its hands on as many rights of the people as it could grasp, has ignored the Constitution, and enthroned treason. [Applause.]

Let me repeat a few sentences that perchance have been lost sight of by some of the rabid friends of the Administration. Let me cull a few choice extracts from what was hailed by the same expansionists as the wisest and most patriotic document ever emanating from the executive department.

In his message to Congress April 11, 1898, President McKinley asked for the use of the Army and Navy "to secure full and final termination of hostilities between the Government of Spain and the people of Cuba," for "it is especially our duty, for it is right at our doors," and the maintenance of neutral relations "entails on this Government an enormous expense;" therefore, "in the name of humanity, in the name of civilization, in behalf of endangered American interests, which give us the right to speak and to act, the war in Cuba must stop." These are the central thoughts, the keynote of that message. Search it through and through, and you will find only Cuba mentioned. Very few, indeed, are there in all this land who believe that President McKinley ever desired to see Cuba free. Forced to action by the spontaneous demand of a great and patriotic people, he sent his message, but all through the history of those days, and between the lines of that message, was revealed his desire for Spanish autonomy in Cuba; but it was all Cuba, and all in the interest of humanity. Never a word of the isles across the sea or of conquest.

Now, how reads the declaration of war? "That the Government of Spain at once relinquish its authority and government in the island of Cuba, and withdraw its land and naval forces from Cuba and Cuban waters." And in the final summing up of the resolutions, which were to lay before the nations of the earth the solemn purposes of this Government, we declared: "That the United States hereby disclaims any disposition or intention to exercise sovereignty, jurisdiction, or control over said island, except for the pacification thereof, and asserts its determination, when that is accomplished, to leave the government and control of the island to its people."

That was the official act and declaration of this the highest legislative body of the nation, and it stands unaltered and unchanged in any of its wording to-day.

It would seem that our Republican friends have either very short memory or seek to read new meaning into the English language. This was a great humanitarian conflict with the object to expel the Spaniards from Cuba, and yet, before a single soldier was started for Cuba from our shores, an army, fully equipped, was sent by President McKinley on a mission of conquest 10,000 miles away to the Philippines. Again, even after the peace protocol was signed, under the orders of the Chief Executive, the Commander in Chief of our Army and Navy, another army was sent to Manila. What for? Not to fight Spain, not to free Cuba, not "in the name of humanity, in the name of civilization, in behalf of endangered American interests;" no, but to drive from dominion native insurgents who, under General Aguinaldo, were fighting Spain for their liberty and the permanence of their established government.

Never was there a more monumental betrayal of national trust, placing the United States before the world as a conscienceless liar and grasping thief. He had no more right to send an army against the Filipinos than he had to send troops to Ireland. The declaration of war gave us no right to interfere with these insurgents. How about the peace protocol? Listen to the only provision of that document relating to the Orient. It is Article III:

The United States will occupy and retain the city and bay of San Juan de Porto Rico, and the port of Manila, pending a treaty of peace, which shall determine the control and form of government of the Philippines.

Let me say right here that all the talk of this having been a war for humanity is the veriest sham and hypocrisy. It was a war for revenge and castigation. We whipped Spain, and it was our right then as victors to dictate terms and demand reparation and a war indemnity. [Applause.]

But the scheming band of conspirators, the holders of Spanish bonds, who stand so near the seat of power in this Government, they who are the Warwicks, the "power behind the throne," dictated and controlled the affairs of state from the inauguration of this Administration down through all the hell of war, through the sittings of the Peace Commission at Paris and down to the present time, so manipulated that only their own interests were conserved. Under direction and in obedience to their orders, it was declared to be a war for humanity, and we were estopped from demanding indemnity; but where, in all the records, in message, resolutions, or protocol, is there a word or syllable relative to or permitting the United States to pay an indemnity?

Why should we pay out $20,000,000 for the Philippines, and especially why pay it to Spain? If the islands were the property of Spain to dispose of, we came into possession of them by virtue of conquest. But Spain had no power to dispose of them, and the high-priced Peace Commission of Paris had not one iota, not the least scintilla of a shadow of right, power, or authority to bind this Government to the payment of a single penny or peseta for any territory, Cuba, Porto Rico, or the Philippines. That commission of five Americans and five Spaniards was the outcome of a provision in that protocol which was inspired by the holders of the $400,000,000 Spanish Cuban bonds, and future generations will hold the American members of that commission in just execration as the betrayers of their country. [Applause.]

These imperial expansionists now arise and with uplifted hands and streaming eyes ask, "What can we do?"—meaning, What can we do to recoup ourselves for this $20,000,000 paid out? and also, How can we get rid of the Philippines if we do not keep them? In the first place, we have not as yet paid out our $20,000,000, and there is no reason or obligation, moral or legal, why we should, and we will do so, if we do at all, only because the godless greed of hybrid bondholders, without nationality, honor, or patriotism, heart, or soul, dictates the policy of the Republican party. How shall we get rid of them? As yet we do not actually have them, and will not unless imperial ukase and edict goes forth that the price must be paid and the foul bargain consummated.

It would harmonize with the commercialized politics of the day, as represented by Republican leaders, to put them on the bargain counter or auction table and sell them to competing nations, or perchance compel the Philippine Islanders to purchase the liberty they have already won. But the best thing to do is to say to Aguinaldo and other representative leaders, "We are going to get out of here; go ahead and establish your government; take your liberty and make the best of it; we will not force upon you any 'military government' extending over ten or fifteen years, or until the favored syndicates can obtain full control of all valuable franchises and privileges in your islands; we intend to be consistent, honest, and patriotic; we will do as President McKinley promised he would do by Cuba, 'leave the control of the islands to the people therein.'"

What higher glory could there be than in taking this manly, straightforward, and Christian course? Let them alone, keep our money, and save what little of honor there is left to us out of the whole infamous deal at Paris. There is no occasion for hysterics about turning them over to Spain. No one proposes such a course. We could not if we would. Spain could not hold control of them forty-eight hours if our Army and Navy were removed. Let them go and take care of themselves. To keep them would "entail on this Government an enormous expense," and "it is (not) especially our duty, for they are (not) right at our door." Let them alone. It is not incumbent upon us to look after them. Duty to no high principle demands our interference. There never comes to any nation the obligation to perform any duty the performance of which is impossible of realization.

If it is our duty to take these islands and impose upon ourselves and our posterity an enormous, grievous burden for the sake of their redemption and civilization, then it is just as strongly our duty to open up business as the scavengers of the world, and interfere with the domestic relations of the Hottentots, the Kaffirs, the Hindoos, the unspeakable Turk, and everywhere on the globe wherever a human heart may be that is bowed down with oppression, woe, misery, ignorance, or barbarism.

No! We have not these islands now, and to say that we must take them as the only resort left is simply begging the question. We are not in the slightest degree responsible for the condition of the Filipinos, morally, legally, or otherwise. They were struggling for liberty long before Dewey entered Manila's harbor and vanquished the Spanish squadron there, and now, thanks, indeed, to Dewey's guns, they have their freedom from Spain.

If we remain there, we stay for their reenslavement. Let them alone; give them a chance, an opportunity to build up a stable government of their own. Doing this, we will secure their friendship and gratitude; and if we desire their trade we will secure more of it than would come to us under the proposed "open-door" policy of this Administration, and if we want a coaling station, they will gladly give it to us. But perchance this plan would not afford the syndicates opportunity to reach in and filch from the Treasury to their heart's content. "Ah, there's the rub!" [Applause.]

It is not Providence, it is not the condition of the Philippine Islanders, it is not our country's needs that demand the creation of a large standing army. It is the domination of the imperialists in the Republican party, who seek their own aggrandizement at the cost of the destruction of the Republic.

As at the outset I said, I do not believe that the simple annexation of the Philippines would be our ruin, but the success of the conspiracy of which that is one of the moves would bring about its downfall. The conscience of the people is sought to be debauched, the character of the nation undermined, the defenses of virtue and justice weakened, an imperial oligarchy created and maintained by force, and freedom doomed. God grant that the sight of the people may be loosed, their eyes opened to the great danger that lies before them; that truth and reason, justice and right speedily prevail, and our beloved country go forward on its triumphant course, maintaining in her proud supremacy "that this nation, under God, shall have a new birth of freedom, and that government of the people, by the people, and for the people shall not perish from the earth." [Applause.]

Mr. JETT. I now yield to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. ROBB].

Mr. ROBB. Mr. Chairman, I am opposed to the whole plan and purpose for the reorganization and increase of the Army.

I am opposed to it, first, because it is the development of a new system, unnecessary in my opinion, which will largely increase the expenses of our Government and the taxes of those who can least afford to bear its increased burden.

Any new departure involving an increased expenditure of public money should be supported by the soundest reason and justified by unavoidable public necessity. Any additional burdens imposed upon the people, whether in the form of taxation or otherwise, should emanate from the highest conceptions and considerations of public interest and public good. Especially should this be so when the proposition carries with it the expenditure of hundreds of millions of dollars annually, a direct charge upon the resources of our country, and which in time will be augmented rather than diminished.

If there were no other objections to the measure than the enormous cost which it will entail; if there were no other objections to a large standing army than the one of expense, this, in my judgment, is sufficient at this time to warrant the rejection of this bill. The national necessities and national duties are not commensurable with the increased burdens which it will impose. The new responsibilities which we should assume as a result of the war can be met and the public safety guaranteed without thus menacing the liberties of our own people.

I am willing to admit that if we are, as an outgrowth of the war, to enter upon and become committed to a policy of imperialism; if we are to assume responsibilities foreign to the declared purposes of that war as well as to the fundamental principles of our Government; if we are to establish the colonial system and maintain it, the occasions will not be infrequent when we will need the services of a hundred thousand men in arms and of possibly more. But I have indulged the hope that public opinion, the builder and wrecker of political fortunes, may become so aroused and the voice of popular disapproval so pronounced as to turn from their mad purpose those who would launch us upon a course the end of which and good of which no man can foretell and the most far-seeing can not foresee.

If the original and fundamental principles of the Government are adhered to and the counsels and high purposes of its founders observed, we are absolutely secure; in fact, more secure without than with an increase in the Regular Army. If this bill becomes a law, it is estimated in the report of the minority of the Committee on Military Affairs that it will cost the people annually $150,000,000. If it costs this much, and I have no doubt but what it will, our annual expenditure on account of the Army will almost equal the cost of our war with Spain. Should we do this? Should we inaugurate a system which will in the end, as one of the abuses growing out of the war, magnify its cost and make it more burdensome to the people in time of peace than in time of war when exposed to actual public danger?

Why not allow it to be proclaimed to the country, that the people may again rejoice over our remarkable achievements in this war, that it is not to be followed by a long train of unnecessary abuses, reckless expenditures, and increasing taxation? If that war demonstrated anything, it was that we need no large standing army. We need not shape our policy after that of European powers and burden our people with this increased expenditure. It had been more than thirty years since our civil conflict, and we had been at peace with every foreign power for over half a century, when suddenly summoned to conflict with a foreign foe, on foreign land and in foreign waters. Yet our victory was as overwhelming as was the response of our people to the call to arms—complete and instantaneous—and the prowess of our seamen and citizen soldiery unquestioned.

When we stop to consider the magnitude of the established objects of expenditure and the new ones proposed by the present Congress, and what it means to the taxpayers of our country, it is little short of alarming.

Let us see. The Senate has recently passed a bill, which will in all probability pass this House at the present session, for the construction of the Nicaragua Canal, which carries with it $125,000,000.

If this bill increasing the Regular Army becomes a law it will cost $150,000,000 annually. Our expenses for pensions will reach $145,000,000 annually. If to these we add the other expenses of our Government, including the interest on our national debt, and to this we add $20,000,000 more which we are asked to pay to Spain for unloading upon us a group of islands populated by several hundred thousands of savages and several millions of semi-civilized people; indeed, if even then we have reached the high-water mark of national expenditures, which is problematical and exceedingly doubtful, the aggregate is so enormous and so disproportionate to the means and ability of those upon whom is laid most heavily the hand of taxation as to lead to the inquiry whether it is the part of wisdom to subdue our own people by governmental exactions in order to respond to a sentiment which some gentlemen have been pleased to call "expansion," but which President McKinley but a short time ago denominated "criminal aggression," what will it profit us if we gain the Philippines and lose the proud spirit of American freemen?

Mr. Chairman, if the price of the annexation of the Philippines is the establishment and maintenance of a large permanent standing army, and the increased burdens which the people will have to bear—that is, those of the people who can not hide themselves from the taxgatherer behind a Supreme Court decision—we had better forego the ambition to adopt this child of the Orient, vote down this bill, muster out our volunteers as soon as practicable, resume our peaceful pursuits under civil authority, and in the future, as in the past, encourage by our example other countries and other nations to adopt a republican form of government.

This is not the first time that attempts have been made to increase the Army since the close of the civil war. At different times numerous and varied pretexts and excuses have been offered in support of propositions and measures looking to this end. For coast defenses, and the protection of our frontier from the Indians have been urged; and in the discussion some of its advocates have been frank and bold enough to admit that it was for the purpose of controlling local disturbances in our own country. The pending measure can not be justified for any such purpose. Our present Army, with the militia, is all that is necessary.

There is an old statute (section 1625, Revised Statutes of the United States, 1878) which reads as follows:

Every able-bodied male citizen of the respective States resident therein, who is of the age of 18 years and under the age of 45 years, shall be enrolled in the militia.

Other sections provided how they should be armed and equipped, etc. While this statute has fallen into disuse, it has been continued in our revision and serves to indicate the idea of the earlier lawmakers with respect to that part of our military force. They had faith in the militia, trusted in the ability and bravery and patriotism of our citizen soldiery as contradistinguished from those of the Regular Army, looked to them as our best reliance then, as they and our volunteers are now, and will be in the future, if they be not discredited and that spirit which moves men to action be not destroyed.

Among the express powers conferred upon Congress by our Constitution is the power "to provide for calling forth the militia to execute the laws of the Union, suppress insurrections, and repel invasions."

And Washington in his sixth annual address, in recognition of the wisdom of this power, said:

The devising and establishing of a well-regulated militia would be a genuine source of legislative honor and a perfect title to public gratitude. I therefore entertain a hope that the present session will not pass without carrying to its full energy the power of organizing, arming, and disciplining the militia, and thus providing in the language of the Constitution for calling them forth to execute the laws of the Union, suppress insurrections, and repel invasions.

What has Congress done in this respect? Read section 5297 of the Revised Statutes of the United States:

SEC. 5297. In case of an insurrection in any State against the government thereof, it shall be lawful for the President, on application of the legislature of such State, or of the executive, when the legislature can not be convened, to call forth such number of the militia of any other State or States, which may be applied for, as he deems sufficient to suppress such insurrection; or, on like application, to employ, for the same purposes, such part of the land or naval forces of the United States as he deems necessary.

And section 5298:

SEC. 5298. Whenever, by reason of unlawful obstructions, combinations, or assemblages of persons, or rebellion against the authority of the Government of the United States, it shall become impracticable, in the judgment of the President, to enforce, by the ordinary course of judicial proceedings, the laws of the United States within any State or Territory, it shall be lawful for the President to call forth the militia of any or all the States, and to employ such parts of the land and naval forces of the United States as he may deem necessary to enforce the faithful execution of the laws of the United States, or to suppress such rebellion, in whatever State or Territory thereof the laws of the United States may be forcibly opposed or the execution thereof forcibly obstructed.

And section 5299:

SEC. 5299. Whenever insurrection, domestic violence, unlawful combinations, or conspiracies in any State so obstructs or hinders the execution of the laws thereof, and of the United States, as to deprive any portion or class of the people of such State of any of the rights, privileges, or immunities, or protection named in the Constitution and secured by the laws for the protection of such rights, privileges, or immunities, and the constituted authorities of such State are unable to protect, or, from any cause, fail in or refuse protection of the people in such rights, such facts shall be deemed a denial by such State of the equal protection of the laws to which they are entitled under the Constitution of the United States; and in all such cases, or whenever any such insurrection, violence, unlawful combination, or conspiracy opposes or obstructs the laws of the United States, or the due execution thereof, or impedes or obstructs the due course of justice under the same, it shall be lawful for the President, and it shall be his duty, to take such measures, by the employment of the militia or the land and naval forces of the United States, or of either, or by other means, as he may deem necessary, for the suppression of such insurrection, domestic violence, or combinations.

Is not this power all-sufficient, if in the judgment of the constituted authorities in any State the exercise of Federal power and Federal authority be required for any purpose whatsoever?

Again, should we be threatened with an invasion, the power of the President is ample, his authority complete. It is provided in sections 1642, 1643, and 1644, Revised Statutes of the United States, as follows:

SEC. 1642. Whenever the United States are invaded, or are in imminent danger of invasion from any foreign nation or Indian tribe, or of rebellion against the authority of the Government of the United States, it shall be lawful for the President to call forth such number of the militia of the State or States most convenient to the place of danger or scene of action as he may deem necessary to repel such invasion, or to suppress such rebellion, and to issue his orders for that purpose to such officers of the militia as he may think proper.

SEC. 1643. When the militia of more than one State is called into the actual service of the United States by the President, he shall apportion them among such States according to representative population.

SEC. 1644. The militia, when called into the actual service of the United States for the suppression of rebellion against and resistance to the laws of the United States, shall be subject to the same rules and articles of war as the regular troops of the United States.

Mr. Jefferson taught that the militia and the volunteers were our safest and best reliance. In his first annual message, speaking of the number of men required to garrison certain posts and stations, he said:

For defense against invasion their number is nothing; nor is it conceived needful or safe that a standing Army should be kept up in time of peace for that purpose. Uncertain as we must ever be of the particular point in our circumference where an enemy may choose to invade us, the only force which can be ready at every point and competent to oppose them is the body of neighboring citizens as formed into a militia.

And again, in his sixth annual message, he said:

Were armies to be raised whenever a speck of war is visible in our horizon we never should have been without them. Our resources would have been exhausted on dangers which have never happened, instead of being reserved for what is really to take place. * * * A militia so organized that its effective portions can be called to any point in the Union, or volunteers instead of them to serve a sufficient time, are means which may always be ready, yet never preying on our resources until actually called into use.

The first political platform ever promulgated by any party in this country, the one upon which Jefferson was nominated and elected, declared in opposition to a large standing Army. Washington was opposed to a large standing Army, as was also Jefferson, the Adamses, Monroe, Jackson, and as has been the entire policy of our country.

President Monroe, in his first inaugural address, said:

But it ought always to be held prominently in view that the safety of these States and of everything dear to a free people must depend in an eminent degree on the militia. Invasions may be made too formidable to be resisted by any land and naval force which it would comport either with the principles of our Government or the circumstances of the United States to maintain. In such cases recourse must be had to the great body of the people, and in a manner to produce the best effect.

Andrew Jackson considered standing armies dangerous to free institutions. In his first inaugural address he said:

Considering standing armies as dangerous to free governments in time of peace, I shall not seek to enlarge our present establishment, nor to disregard that salutary lesson of political experience which teaches that the military should be held subordinate to the civil power.

We should not increase our military establishment now. We should profit by the lessons of the past. We should heed the warning of our wisest and best statesmen. We should not surrender the essential principle upon which republican institutions must rest—a reliance upon and trust in the people.

But we are told that we have, or are about to have, Cuba, Porto Rico, and the Philippines on our hands; that as a result of the war new and unforeseen responsibilities and obligations have been thrust upon us which require this increase in the Regular Army. What are those responsibilities and obligations? In the war resolutions it is declared:

That the United States hereby disclaims any disposition or intention to exercise sovereignty, jurisdiction, or control over said island except for the pacification thereof, and asserts its determination, when that is accomplished, to leave the government and control of the island to its people.

Our duty and responsibility as to Cuba is the pacification thereof, and when that is accomplished our responsibility ceases. It is for the people of the island to form their own government in their own way. And as to Porto Rico, the island whose people welcomed the approach of our army, what is a large military force going to do there among people at peace with each other and in sympathy with our country? I can see no need of it, and am unable to understand why the native police or military force organized from the citizens of that island will not do all that is required.

Mr. Chairman, as to the Philippines, it might take 50,000 or 100,000, but more likely 200,000, men if we undertake to subjugate and hold those islands, to say nothing of what it may cost in the way of blood and treasure as a result of being exposed to European jealousies, becoming involved in European broils and European struggles.

I am opposed to the annexation of the Philippines and am opposed to an increase of the Army as a step in that direction. The Filipinos were in rebellion against Spain when Dewey sailed into Manila Bay and sank the Spanish fleet; they were in rebellion against Spain when the city of Manila was taken. Our purpose in going there was not the subjugation of those people, but to weaken the power of our enemy with which we were at war. Having for that purpose stricken down the hand of the oppressor in our own behalf, and not in behalf of those in rebellion, I can not understand wherein lies our duty to Spain, to the Filipinos, or to ourselves to become the future guardians and responsible for the future conduct of those people.

Would I turn them back to Spain? No. Neither would I pay Spain $20,000,000 in consideration of her cession of sovereignty or relinquishment of authority over them. I would leave them to themselves to establish their own government, encouraging them in the idea of republican institutions, and bid them godspeed in their undertaking. To do otherwise, to annex the Philippines, to subjugate the inhabitants and hold them in military bondage is to violate every principle upon which our Government was established and to expose us to danger for a generation to come. Never was there a time when the words of Washington in his Farewell Address should appeal to the Executive, to the legislative branch of the Government, and to the people with so much potency. He said:

The great rule of conduct for us, in regard to foreign nations, is, in extending our commercial relations, to have with them as little political connection as possible. So far as we have already formed engagements, let them be fulfilled with perfect good faith. Here let us stop.

Europe has a set of primary interests which to us have none, or a very remote, relation. Hence, she must be engaged in frequent controversies, the causes of which are essentially foreign to our concerns. Hence, therefore, it must be unwise in us to implicate ourselves, by artificial ties, in the ordinary vicissitudes of her politics or the ordinary combinations and collisions of her friendships or enmities.

Our detached and distant situation invites and enables us to pursue a different course. If we remain one people, under an efficient government, the period is not far off when we may defy material injury from external annoyance; when we take such an attitude as will cause the neutrality we may at any time resolve upon to be scrupulously respected; when belligerent nations, under the impossibility of making acquisitions upon us, will not lightly hazard the giving us provocation; when we may choose peace or war, as our interest, guided by justice, shall counsel.

Why forego the advantages of so peculiar a situation? Why quit our own to stand upon foreign ground? Why, by interweaving our destiny with that of any part of Europe, entangle our peace and prosperity in the toils of European ambition, rivalship, interest, humor, or caprice?

Let us, of all other things we may do or refuse to do during this Congress, not invite conditions which will involve us in disasters against which he warned us.

I notice in a London correspondence to the Washington Post of January 11 that it is the dread of Queen Victoria's dying days that Europe will be involved in a bloody war that will darken the close of her long reign.

If that dread time comes, Mr. Chairman, may it be said to the honor, glory, and peace of this nation and to the everlasting credit and felicitation of the statesmanship of this time that we are but interested spectators of the general upheaval. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, it is the proud boast of the Britons that the sun never sets on the Queen's dominions. But it is equally true that there is always sunshine on Uncle Sam's vast possessions, and this, too, before the annexation of Hawaii. When it is 6 p. m. on Attu Island, Alaska, it is 9.36 a. m. of the day following at Eastport, Me. And it is said that there are not two consecutive months in the year in which there is not both seedtime and harvest within the confines of our immense territory. Need we, therefore, now thirst for more, at the risk of exposing our institutions and the peace of the nation for generations to come? [Applause.]

Mr. MARSH. Mr. Chairman, I yield twenty minutes to my colleague [Mr. CONNOLLY].

Mr. CONNOLLY. Mr. Chairman, when I cast my vote, I shall be compelled to cast it against this bill. [Applause.] I thought it proper, inasmuch as my naked vote standing in the RECORD would not show any reason why I voted different from the probable majority of my party colleagues in the House—that it would be proper for me to put something in the RECORD to show some of the reasons that actuated me. There has been for years a growing sentiment among the people of the United States—the plain people, not the Army officers, but those who bear the heat and burden of the day in this great Republic—in favor of settling the questions in dispute with foreign nations by arbitration instead of by arms. We in this House now, at the close of the nineteenth century, are proposing to answer that appeal that comes up from the people of the United States by quadrupling the size of our Regular Army.

What kind of an answer is that that the representatives of the people propose to give to the demands that have been growing yearly in favor of the peaceful settlement of all questions of difference with foreign nations?

Again, a most singular thing presents itself. The autocrat of Russia, the sole head of that great nation, invites the nations of the world to a conference for the purpose of agreeing upon a plan to reduce the armaments that are bearing down his nation and all the nations of Europe with the tremendous burdens of taxation that are being piled upon the shoulders of those people in preparing the armaments that have been quoted to us in this debate as something to be followed in this country. We in this republican government of the people, for the people, and by the people, answer that call of the Czar of Russia by proposing to quadruple the fighting forces of the American Republic. What must the world argue from this but that the heads of the people of the United States are turned by this paltry victory they have won from a feeble enemy? [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, the Army as it stands to-day, with its twenty-six thousand and odd men, has been large enough from the beginning of this Government down to to-day. We have lived more than a century under it. That Army, together with the volunteers, have made the flag of the United States respected within our own borders and respected throughout the world. When the day comes that the Republic must depend upon hired men to carry its flag and do its fighting, men professionally engaged in that business, the beginning of the end of this Republic has come. All the successful wars this nation has fought have been fought by the volunteers [applause]; and I have been tired in this debate of hearing so many disparaging remarks upon the volunteers, and talk that the volunteer can not be depended upon.

Now, I am sorry to say that advantage is sought to be taken of the temporary martial spirit that has been aroused by the late war with Spain to seek to do what could not have been done twelve months ago or two years ago; seeking to do that which in time of ordinary peace, when our people are engaged and their thoughts are turned to peaceful avocations in life, never could have been considered one hour in this House of Representatives—an attempt to increase the size of our standing Army, and to do it by taking advantage of the temporary martial spirit that has been aroused.

Mr. Chairman, I look beyond this year, I look beyond the next two or three years from now. Our nation will still be here; we will be, I hope, in profound peace. We will have no need for a standing Army of any account any more than we had last year or the year before. I look to see the people of the United States bending their backs under the burdens of taxation that will be imposed upon them in case we quadruple this Army. Can we justify ourselves in doing it? It is all very well, in making patriotic speeches, to talk about the glory of the flag, the glory of our armies, and what the regulars have done and what the volunteers have done; but, Mr. Chairman, when the day of sober judgment and sober thought comes, the people of the United States have to pay the expenses for all these glorious things. They are looking to us to-day, and I apprehend that every member in this House has received letters from constituents inquiring when they will be relieved of the revenue taxes that were cheerfully borne in the support of the Spanish war and its expenses. Pass this bill, and you can answer those constituents confidently that never during this generation, nor in the generation to come, will the people of this country get rid of the revenue stamps that are stuck all over them. [Laughter.] We must consider these things.

Now, the pretext is being made in this House by many that because of the condition of things in the Philippine Islands we must have a largely increased standing Army. Why a standing Army? Is that condition of things to remain forever in the Philippine Islands? Will the close of the next century see an American standing army of 100,000 men there? I am ready to vote to furnish all troops necessary now to bring about peace there. I want to see that treaty ratified. I want to see the money paid to Spain. And then I want to see the American Government enforce order there against Mr. Aguinaldo and all his followers. I want them to be taught that we are not to be trifled with. But when we get rid of that adventurer and the adventurous gang that is following at his heels, then I want to appeal to the people of the Philippine Islands and let them make their government as we propose to let Cuba make hers.

What a singular spectacle we have to-day. Here in this end of the Capitol we are seeking to increase the Regular Army to 100,000 men, because we have obtained possession of the Philippine Islands. In the other end of the Capitol, at the very same time, they are insisting that we have not obtained and shall not obtain possession of those islands; that they will not confirm the treaty. Which is right? If gentlemen at the other end of the Capitol have control of this matter, then the settlement is as they say, not as the President says. It is as they say whether we shall have the Philippine Islands or not. We have probably the actual pedis possessione of 10 square miles of land and water. That is all we have.

Now, why seek to quadruple the Regular Army and to add 25 per cent to the retired list of the Army—increase the number of pensioners that are to be perpetually supported by the United States—under the pretense that we must have this Army to maintain order in the Philippines? I am willing to give the President all necessary authority to maintain order there; to give him the right to have all the troops that he in his judgment may find necessary. I have perfect faith and confidence that he would not abuse a trust of that kind reposed in him. But I do not want to force him, in order to get the power which he ought to have, to approve a measure which hangs a yoke around the necks of the American people in the shape of a large standing Army—something that has always been abhorred in this country; something that is fundamentally out of accord with republican institutions. An Army I regard as simply a necessary evil. I want to keep that evil as small as possible. [Applause.]

Mr. JETT. I now yield to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BENTON].

Mr. BENTON. Mr. Chairman, I have paid close attention to the debate on this bill, yet I have not heard a clear statement from a single advocate of the bill as to what the need for a large standing army is in the United States. I have not heard what we are to do with a standing army of 100,000 men. The hint comes from the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs that we must quadruple our standing or Regular Army because of our new possessions in the sea, while the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. LINNEY] seems to think that we must get ready to meet European trouble.

Mr. Chairman, if the Government of the United States is going into world politics, if we are to be ready for all comers, and it takes a standing army to make us ready, then 100,000 men will not suffice. England has the smallest standing army of any of the great European powers, and she keeps under arms constantly over 220,000 soldiers, while Russia leads with a regular army of 750,000 men, closely followed by France and Germany. If a great imperial policy is to prevail, if these United States must take a place in world politics, then our standing Army must be equal to the best; and to be the best, or among the best, we must have 500,000 regular soldiers, to say nothing of the other need—a $500,000,000 Navy.

And, Mr. Chairman, the plain producer must pay the bill. But, Mr. Chairman, the drift of expression among those who are for this bill is that we need this army of 100,000 men to keep peace and order in Cuba, Porto Rico, and the Philippines. Why, Mr. Chairman, Cuba is to set up a free government, and we have pledged the Cubans, pledged ourselves, and pledged the world that we will help them do it. There can be but slight need for an army in Cuba. I venture the assertion that history has no parallel to the orderly behavior of the Cubans since the cessation of active hostilities. They are poor, homeless, with a devastated country, yet so eager are they for the blessings of liberty that they obey every command of our officers. Half a dozen regiments will preserve order in the cities of Cuba, and the country will settle down to peaceful pursuits, unless they begin to believe we mean to keep "Punic faith" with them. We have been led to believe that Porto Ricans came to us with outstretched arms and will be proud to become American citizens. Surely two or three regiments will suffice there.

Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HEPBURN] speaks authoritatively, that it is the purpose of the Administration to pacify the Philippine Islands, "give them an opportunity to establish order and law under such form of government as they choose," then we can not need a large standing army in those islands. Is there a member on this floor who believes there would be danger to our little Navy or to the few thousand soldiers we have over there if the Congress should declare the purpose of our Government to be to aid those people to organize a stable government and then leave the people there to enjoy liberty? If our purpose is to aid the Cubans and Filipinos to establish governments of their own, then a regular army of 30,000 men is all we need for all purposes. But if by any accident a greater force is needed at any time, the substitute of the minority for this bill gives the President the right to call out 50,000 volunteers when they may be needed.

Mr. Chairman, to return to the first proposition, What do we want with a standing army four times as large as the one we have had for more than twenty years? The Indian question has been solved; we have no dangerous border to defend. Besides, it is a costly proceeding. A standing army of 100,000 men, one-half of them to be used outside of the territory of the United States, will cost us $115,000,000 annually. Add to this our pension list of $150,000,000, and the probable pension list of the war we have just finished, and we will expend a grand total of $300,000,000 on our Army each year. Are we rich and powerful enough for that when there is no need of it? Again, I am opposed to this bill because it is a forward step toward imperialism. It is the beginning of militarism. It will be the beginning of the election of Congressmen, governors, and Presidents by military influence.

A large standing army tends inevitably to centralization of government and to decay of individual liberty. A large regular army in time of peace is contrary to the teachings of the fathers. Mr. Jefferson said, "A well-disciplined militia was our best reliance in peace," and even "for the first moments of war." President Jackson said, in his first inaugural address:

> Considering standing armies as dangerous to free governments in time of peace, I shall not seek to enlarge our present establishment, nor to disregard that salutary lesson of political experience which teaches that the military should be held subordinate to the civil power.

Our Government was builded upon the notion that each individual would be free, but would yield something to the general good. Force of arms was not to be tolerated as in opposition to civil authority. I believe in staying close to the doctrines of the fathers. Whenever we wander away from their views we get into deep water. By this bill we more than double the number of officers. This will build up and organize a military aristocracy, and all experience, all history teaches the lesson that this tends to the overthrow of the civil power. The Regular Army officer does not study constitutional questions. If the Constitution stands in the way of what he wants, then he thinks it should be suspended. This desire to enlarge the Regular Army has been the dream of plutocrats, aristocrats, and militarists for years, and they are taking advantage of the patriotic spirit of the people, aroused by the war with Spain, to thrust on us the aristocratic, un-American, and undemocratic idea of a large army being necessary to the safety of the Republic.

Mr. Chairman, I am against this bill because the strength and character of the militia or citizen soldier is to be minified. We saw enough of this in the war just closed. But few regiments of volunteers saw active service. The excuse was that they had no experience, that they were raw troops. Neither had the regulars seen much service. I have no patience with this scheme of putting the regular soldier above the volunteer as being a veteran. Mr. Chairman, the citizen soldiers of the States have been tried on many battlefields. I declare that sixty days of regular drill in camp and one time under fire makes an American volunteer a veteran. The American volunteer is proud of his individuality, loves his country, his State, his home. His heart is fired with patriotic love of the flag, of the institutions of his country, and he does not need to be made a slave, a drilled machine, to become a safe and sturdy soldier.

Mr. Chairman, strip off the disguises, lay bare all the facts, and the purposes of this bill are threefold, to create a military aristocracy, to have an army large enough to overawe and bully labor in these United States, and to hold with the "mailed hand" of military power Porto Rico, the Philippines, and Cuba as well. Some gentlemen who are supporting this bill are frank and open. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MARSH] insists that he "would hold the Philippine Islands not as a part of the United States, but as the property of the United States." Then, Mr. Chairman, what is to become of our much-boasted Declaration of Independence, "that all men are created equal, that they are endowed with certain inalienable rights, that among these are life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness; that to secure these rights governments are instituted among men, deriving their just powers from the consent of the governed"? If the Philippine Islands are to be "the property of these United States," are the Filipinos also to be our property? Are they to have no rights of liberty except what Congress sees fit to give them? This is the view of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MARSH], who speaks plainly what he thinks, and does not veil his thoughts and intentions as do some others.

This position is bold and frank, yet it is brutal, un-American, and violative of every sentiment—every tenet that lies at the foundation of the American Republic. But gentlemen say we must govern the Filipinos because they are not capable of self-government. Who knows this to be true? They have been fighting for liberty against the merciless power of Spain; they have protested with voice and force against the despotism of Spain. Are we Americans to declare a people can not govern themselves? After long centuries of kingcraft, Americans declared for self-government, insisted that "consent of the governed" was essential to "just governments," and with courage undaunted and patience unparalleled maintained their declaration. Americans established a government founded on consent of the governed, and for more than a hundred years our Government has been a beacon light to liberty lovers the world over. It does not lie in our mouths to say that any people are incapable of self-government. Every people are entitled to try the experiment.

Mr. Chairman, we have fallen upon strange times. We hear now that we must expand, must go into world politics, must make alliances with other powers in the Old World. We are told by generals, statesmen, and newspapers that the doctrines and counsel of Washington and Jefferson and Jackson are obsolete and no longer wise. It is insisted that a friendly alliance with England will be of great service. It would be to England, not to us. There is not a nation on earth and never has been that knows better how to take care of herself than England. But her labors, her legislation, her diplomacy, her wars, and her alliances are always for England's benefit. She has given us the "gold standard," she owns our securities and much of our property, and is doubtless willing to make a temporary ally of the "Giant of the West."

A very potent reason for enlarging the standing Army is to keep labor in subjection in this country. In a small way it has been tried. Make the Army four times as large as it has been for twenty-five years, put the soldiers under control of Federal courts, and government by injunction, enforced by the "Regular Army," will bully labor till in all the centers of population capitalized trusts can absolutely and completely control labor with an iron hand. But, Mr. Chairman, since this debate has been on we hear some mutterings of discontent with the bill by gentlemen in the majority, and the members of the Committee on Military Affairs from the majority side of the House are now proposing to make the standing Army of only 50,000 men, but authorizing the President, in his discretion, to augment it to 100,000 men. Worse and worse! I will not vote such discretion to this President or to any man who may be President. Let the Congress boldly do what it intends. It is a power that should not be given any one man, however wise, honest, or patriotic he may be. The power given the President in time of peace to call out 50,000 men and double the standing Army at a cost of from $50,000,000 to $70,000,000 per annum is without precedent. This is centralization of power with a vengeance. Congress may as well surrender its constitutional right to declare war and authorize the President to go to war when he chooses.

Mr. Chairman, I may be driven from public life, but I will not consent to shut my mouth and not protest against militarism, centralization, and all that I believe to be undemocratic and subversive of the liberties of the plain, common people. I am willing to vote for fortifications along our seacoast, guns to put on the forts, and for soldiers to man the guns; I am willing to vote money to build up a respectable Navy; I am willing to support a small standing army, as a nucleus for a great army if the need comes; but I will not vote for any bill that I believe will curtail the liberty of an American citizen, pile up additional burdens in the way of taxation upon the producer, or in the least be subversive of the Constitution of my country or in violation of any of the doctrines of the Declaration of Independence or of Thomas Jefferson's first inaugural address. [Applause.]

Mr. JETT. I now yield to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. PIERCE].

[Mr. PIERCE of Tennessee addressed the committee. See Appendix.]

Mr. JETT. I now yield to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. LEWIS].

Mr. LEWIS of Georgia. Mr. Chairman, the increase of our former peace standing army of 26,000 and the present Army of 57,000 to that of 100,000 men is a serious and momentous question in which every American citizen, from the various standpoints, feels the deepest interest.

The American people may be accused of sometimes acting from sentiment, but they are just, and as a rule are a nation of practical people; therefore they will demand their right to know of this Congress its reason for so rapid and so radical a change in the military status of this country. In their calm, deliberate, and matured moments the American people move and act from sound reasoning.

NO DEFINITE POLICY.

Congress is called upon to pass a bill for the reorganization of the Army which proposes a hazardous innovation upon the ancient and fixed policy of this Government touching a standing army in times of peace, with no idea of what the policy of the President is with reference to the Philippine Islands and with no good reason for the increase of the Army. Has it come to this, that the Congress of the United States must make laws without reference to the purpose for which they are made? Are we a nation of dreamers? Republican members of the House have been repeatedly asked what the policy of the Executive is that demands so large a permanent standing army. Senators at the other end of the Capitol have, in the discussion of the Paris treaty, urged their Republican colleagues to disclose the Administration's policy with reference to the Philippine Islands.

These earnest inquiries have never been answered by any member in the confidence of the President. And in this great, free, and independent Republic, the birthplace and cradle of Liberty, we behold this strange spectacle: The Congress of the people assembled, the Senate urged to ratify a treaty of peace, the House of Representatives at the same time importuned to pass a bill for the reorganization of the Army, increasing the present peace standing Army of 26,000 to a permanent standing Army of 100,000 men. One branch of the lawmaking power engaged in the discussion of peace, the other branch preparing for war by seeking to increase the standing Army to 100,000 men. The Congress is called upon to legislate on these important and far-reaching questions with no fixed purpose in view. If the citizens of this country have not the right to know the policies of an administration, certainly the lawmaking power has the right to know.

THE PEOPLE TIRED OF VACILLATION AND UNCERTAINTY.

The Americans have had enough of the drifting and vacillating policy of this Government. I recall the course of the Executive prior to the declaration of war with Spain, how he was driven by his own party, which, grown restive over his indecision and uncertain policy, had begun to hold caucuses, to the course he pursued in sending to Congress his war message. The President's conduct with reference to the Filipinos is but a repetition of his vacillating and drifting policy with reference to the Cubans prior to the declaration of war. But our brave soldiers emerged from the conflict victorious and without a stain, subject to no criticism, and this country will not stop to inquire whether the history of that memorable struggle was the result of deep-seated forethought on the part of the Executive or whether his course was inspired by deference to public opinion.

THE COST OF THIS INCREASED ARMY.

Under the provisions of the pending bill the standing Army is increased to 100,000 men. It is estimated that each soldier serving in the United States will cost the Government $1,000 annually. The bill under consideration provides for an increase in pay of 25 per cent to all officers and men serving in foreign countries. Then for each soldier who serves in the Philippine Islands the Government must pay not less than $1,500 per annum. It will, on a conservative estimate, require 50,000 men to force the President's imperialistic policy on the Filipinos, which would cost us $75,000,000, the cost of transportation, which is a considerable item not being considered. The depletion of armies serving in tropical countries by death and sickness, as shown by the experience of the English in India and other tropical climates, is alarming, equaling in some instances 20 per cent of their entire strength. Such heavy loss by death and sickness will swell the pension roll to an amount we can not reckon.

The Navy must be strengthened, if this policy of imperialism is adopted, at an enormous cost. Already the Secretary of the Navy has submitted estimates for the construction of fifteen battle ships, at a cost of $38,000,000.

But the cost of this imperial experiment, which the pending bill is put forth to further and defend, can not be measured in money. It will cost the lives and health of countless young American soldiers; it will cost saddened and broken homes; and if history repeats itself, it will cost the domestic peace and happiness of our country.

HOW WILL THE PROPOSED INCREASE OF EXPENSE BE MET?

We should consider how the burdens of taxation which the pending bill proposes to impose on the people are to be borne and by whom they are to be borne. We can not suppose the increased taxation is to be met by revenue collected from the Philippine Islands, for they never yielded Spain in any one year over $13,000,000. These additional burdens on the people can only be met by a higher tariff, which levies oppressive tribute on the consumer and protects and enriches the manufacturer, by increased internal revenue, or by an issue of bonds, which furnishes a safe and remunerative investment for capital at the expense of honest toil. These additional taxes should not be imposed upon a people who are already taxed to death.

ADMIRAL DEWEY'S MATCHLESS VICTORY IN MANILA BAY.

The splendid victory of Admiral Dewey in Manila Bay dates the beginning of our foreign entanglements and alliances. Had Dewey never landed there and had no troops been sent to the Philippine Islands, it would have been a great event for the domestic tranquillity of this country.

If the Paris commission had not insisted on the cession by Spain of the Philippine Islands, for which we are to pay $20,000,000, we would not to-day be annoyed with these perplexing questions and our Army in the Philippine Islands would not be drawn up in battle array against an army whose forces they were presumably sent to strengthen against a common foe.

THE QUESTION OF SELF-GOVERNMENT FOR THE FILIPINOS.

I feel that it would be best to pay Spain $20,000,000 and decree the Filipinos a free and independent people. They are capable of self-government. I quote the following from Mr. Andrew Carnegie, a gentleman of extensive travel in the oriental countries and a man of wide and accurate information:

Do you think the Filipinos capable of self-government?

Well, Admiral Dewey reports them much better qualified for self-government than the Cubans, and he knows both races well. President McKinley differs from swearing Shafter, and thinks the Cubans fit to be promised independence at the earliest possible moment. But I go further than this. No people who ever felt the divine impulse for independent nationality should be denied a fair trial. It will be impossible for us to help the Filipinos establish a stable government unless we are needed, desired, and welcomed by the people. Forcible interference, besides being criminal aggression, would mean continual rebellion. National aspirations are rarely quenched. You would make rebellion patriotic, and never could establish a reign of peace in the Philippines. We have only 56,000 regular soldiers. If we send them all to shoot down these people they could only occupy some of the ports, never possess the interior, and a worse enemy than even the Filipinos would be the climate, slowly wasting away the soldiers.

As to American influence elevating and civilizing the Filipinos, what kind of American influence can you send there? Would 50,000 soldiers be good missionaries? Does not every one know that soldiers in foreign lands require the strictest discipline themselves? Is not 46 per cent of the British troops in India to-day officially reported as diseased so terribly that we can not even mention their condition? Will ours be better in the Philippines? No! You can not establish American homes there; no wife and children, no sweet, holy influences are possible there. On the contrary, only demoralization. It is not true that a superior race governing an inferior race in the Tropics elevates or improves the inferior when the superior race can not take with it the wives and children and create homes there. If President McKinley ever had been, as I have been, in the far East, he would have known better than to be deluded in this matter. It is time to cease talking vaguely of elevating or improving the Filipinos by soldiers and adventurers, who will corrupt and demoralize them.

There are about 25,000 European residents in the islands, composed of English, French, and German people. They are capable of self-government, and desire the opportunity of governing themselves. Let us depart from the island and leave them to the responsibility of their own government.

No other government in the world will undertake to subdue them. It will be time enough for us to act when some other nation offers to conquer the islands.

THE PRESIDENT SHOULD BE FRANK WITH THE AMERICAN PEOPLE AS WELL AS WITH THE FILIPINOS.

If it is the policy of the President not to hold the Philippines permanently, he ought to be frank with the American people as well as with the Filipinos, and say so. If the Executive would declare his intention not to hold the Philippine Islands, the Paris treaty would be ratified in twenty-four hours and this bill for the reorganization of the Army would be withdrawn from the House and the Army of the United States again put upon a peace footing.

THE VALUE OF THE PHILIPPINE ISLANDS TO US.

Of what value are the Philippine Islands to us—a group of some 2,000 islands, distant 7,000 miles from our nearest port, and inhabited by about 8,000,000 people? The climate of the islands is such that our race can not thrive there. History teaches that the white race can not thrive in tropical climates. I desire to insert in my remarks a letter from Mr. Carnegie, a gentleman whose views are entitled to great respect by reason of his personal observations in the Orient:

To the EDITOR OF THE WORLD:

The ablest administrator yet cast up by the recent war is General Wood, of Santiago fame.

He told the Congressional committee the other day that "50,000 troops are required for Cuba, this number being necessary because of the climate, for only 35 to 40 per cent will be found effective as a rule. A day's active service would cause half of any military force to drop out. This is the reason Spain needed 228,000 troops in Cuba." The approaching yellow-fever season will swell the long death roll. So much for Cuba.

Professor Worcester, a member of the Philippine Commission, says in his book upon the archipelago, where he resided for years: "It is unfortunately true that the climate of the Philippines is especially severe in its effects on white women and children. It is very doubtful, in my judgment, if successive generations of European or American children could be reared there.

"If a man is permanently situated in a good locality where he can get suitable food and good drinking water, if he is scrupulously careful as to his diet, if he avoids excesses of all kinds, if he keeps out of the sun in the middle of the day, if he refrains from severe and prolonged physical exertion, he is likely to remain well, always supposing that he is fortunate enough to escape malarial infection," which he says "is especially prevalent where forest land is being cleared or new ground broken. It is often very bad near poddy fields during the dry season."

What chance have our troops to fulfill all these necessary ifs to render it likely they will escape, provided only they escape malaria? Very little indeed.

So much for this coveted possession for which President McKinley invites us to pay $20,000,000 and perhaps spend a thousand millions shooting down the natives in order to impose upon them our foreign yoke against their desire.

It is to such conditions the President recklessly proposes to expose our soldiers during the coming summer.

An epidemic among the troops is probable in one or both of these foreign lands, and what will the American people have to say to the President then? God help the President! Who is there in all this land who would share his responsibility? And for what, Mr. Editor; for what? Only that we may meddle and muddle in other people's affairs, our interference only tolerated in the one case and forcibly resisted in the other.

ANDREW CARNEGIE.

NEW YORK, January 22.

The chief products of the Philippine Islands are hemp, tobacco, and sugar, all of which would come in competition with our like American products. The total business of the Philippine Islands, including exports and imports, for 1896 was only of the value of $90,000,000. The imports into the Philippines from the United States in 1897 were but $94,597.

Then let us not possess ourselves of distant territory which in time of war we would be compelled to defend, and which may involve us in perpetual entanglements with foreign countries, when we get so little in return.

I will never, as long as I occupy a seat on the floor of this House—and I believe I voice the sentiment of the people whom I am commissioned to represent—consent to vote for a bill increasing the regular peace standing Army of 26,000 men to a permanent standing Army of 100,000 men, and saddling heavier burdens of taxation upon a people already taxed beyond the power of endurance for the purpose of forcing an experimental imperialistic project upon a people struggling to be free. If I occupied a seat in the Senate Chamber, I would never vote for the ratification of a treaty of peace when it is the manifest purpose of the political party seeking its ratification to force upon the Filipinos a government they do not want, a political party that would subvert the doctrine that is the very basic principle of the greatest Government the world ever saw, "All Governments derive their just powers from the consent of the governed," and substitute therefore, as the rule of their conduct, the principle that has strewn the highway of time with the wrecks of monarchies and republics, "Might makes right."

Let us remain solid and compact, and we will remain impregnable and indestructible. [Applause.]

Mr. JETT. I now yield to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. STEPHENS].

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I shall vote against the bill under consideration.

It provides for increasing our Regular Army to 100,000 men. Each man will, it is estimated, cost the Government $1,000, making a total of $100,000,000. It will cost much more than this per man in any of our islands. This estimate does not include the salary of officers in the actual service or on the retired list; it does not include transportation, and many other things. From the best estimates on the subject I believe the Army provided for by this bill will cost us one hundred and fifty millions per annum.

This bill is the most extravagant Army bill ever proposed by this or any other government. It is far more extravagant than the present law. It is now proposed to promote the retiring officer to the next highest grade and give him three-fourths of the pay of that grade. Thus in many cases he would draw more pay after he was retired and doing nothing than while he was in the actual service. This is a willful robbery of the taxpayers, and aids in building up an Army aristocracy. This bill provides for 100 Army dentists with rank of first lieutenant, and 34 horse doctors with the rank and pay of second lieutenant.

In short, it provides offices for 2,083 more men than the present law provides for, and also adds immensely to the retired list of Army officers.

This bill provides that assistant surgeons shall pass a satisfactory examination instead of a competitive examination, as the present law now requires. This is done so that Department pets and political ward heelers who know nothing of their profession may be appointed. The lives and health of the soldiers are overlooked by the framers of this bundle of iniquity called an Army reorganization bill. The satisfactory examination only means that the doctor has voted the Republican ticket in the past and will do so in the future, and that he has a political pull.

On page 9 of the majority report on this bill, made by the Republican part of the committee, I find this statement, viz:

The committee inserted a new section in regard to the Record and Pension Office, believing that the present chief of that office has by his wonderfully efficient service made it only proper for him to have the rank of brigadier-general.

The new section is section 16 and is as follows:

That the Record and Pension Office of the War Department shall consist of a chief, who shall have the rank, pay, and allowances of a brigadier-general, and an assistant chief, who shall have the rank, pay, and allowances of a lieutenant-colonel.

On the same page this report says:

The retired list is right and proper for men who devote their lives to Army work. It should not be used as an asylum for men who have spent their active life in civil employment.

I agree with the committee that the retired list should not be an asylum for men who have spent their active life in civil employment. Yet, with audacity that is amazing, this committee does the very thing in the bill that they condemn in the report. For instance, the chief and assistant chief clerk mentioned in section 16 may easily be appointed from civil life one year and retired the next year as an Army officer for life. So may the horse doctors, dentists, etc.

There should be no retired list of Army officers, for it makes a privileged class of people, who, from the day they secure an Army appointment to the day of their death, are aristocrats and supported by the public purse. The law permitting this iniquity was passed by the Republican party just after the civil war, at first for the benefit of a few ex-Union generals. Then it was extended to all officers. Not satisfied, the same party, by this bill, propose to create a great army, and add a host of new Army officers thereto, including horse doctors, dentists, and clerks in the War Department. They propose to reduce the age of retirement from 64 to 50, as they have done in the Navy, and thus retire hundreds of officers at once for life on three-fourths pay.

Not satisfied with this (for greed is never satisfied), the officer, when he reaches the retiring age, is first promoted to the next highest grade and receives three-fourths the pay of that grade for life. We will in a few years, if this bill becomes a law, have to support a greater list of retired Army officers than any nation on earth. If all men are equal before the law in this Republic, why does this bill not permit privates who are discharged from the Regular Army to be promoted to some petty office and then retired on three-fourths pay? Why do you not place the privates on the same footing as their officers, who are first promoted and then retired on three-fourths pay for life? What answer will the Republican party make to this question?

If all men are equal, why do you give a greater pension to officers' wives and children than to the wives and children of privates? If all men are equal, why do you require some men seeking Army appointments to stand competitive examinations while others are only required to stand satisfactory examinations, as is the case with assistant surgeons, horse doctors, and dentists?

Mr. Chairman, I have listened patiently through this debate, hoping that some good reasons would be given for enlarging our Regular Army from 25,000 to 100,000 men—for taking six dollars from our taxpayers, instead of one, for the support of our enlarged Army. Yet no excuse has been or can be given for this outrage on our people. Twenty-five thousand men have been found sufficient as a standing army from the foundation of our Government down to this hour. We have been victorious in four foreign wars. We have subdued multiplied thousands of savages on our frontiers, and to-day there is not a hostile Indian in our country.

The Indian problem has been solved, and an army is no longer needed to keep them in subjection. If we will break up their tribal relations, allot to them their lands in severalty, and treat them as we do our own citizens, we can make them support themselves.

The States and Territories where they reside should control them. We can then use our soldiers elsewhere. No soldiers are needed in Hawaii or Porto Rico, except a few companies for garrison duties. We are pledged to withdraw our army from Cuba as soon as the Cubans establish a stable government of their own. If they are given an opportunity, they will do this at once.

Short-time volunteer soldiers can garrison the islands of Cuba and the Philippines just as well as the regulars.

We have no use for all the regular soldiers we now have at home, and can use most of them in the islands. The bone of contention in this debate is whether or not we shall subjugate and hold the Philippine Islands as a conquered province. If we commit this blunder and crime, we must have and use a large standing army.

A coaling station is all the land we need or should have in the Philippine Islands. The city and bay of Manila is all the land we captured on these islands from the Spaniards, and is the only place where our flag floats. We need not pull our flag down from Manila or its harbor and bay. The Philippine Islanders will gladly cede these to us if we will make a treaty with them and permit them to establish a government of their own and in their own way control the rest of their islands. We should treat the Filipinos just as we have proposed to treat the Cubans. If we undertake to conquer the islands, we will have a desperate war on our hands.

I would not give the life of one of our soldiers for the whole of the islands. We need the soldier to build up and protect our own country. We do not need the Philippine Islands for any purpose. If we will be content with what we now have in our possession in the Philippines, we will have no trouble whatever with Aguinaldo or his followers. A small garrison, say one regiment, and a few war vessels is all we would need there. If we must conquer new territory and develop it, our own wild, undeveloped arid region in the West presents a most inviting field for the use of men and money. Both sides of the Colorado of the West and of the Rio Grande River, from their sources in Colorado to the gulfs of California and Mexico, present a grand field for irrigation plants and improvements.

The people living on the Rio Grande River from El Paso to the Gulf would be very greatly benefited by building a high storage dam a few miles above El Paso, where the river passes through a range of mountains. The water impounded by this dam would easily irrigate 1,000,000 acres of land that is now worthless and desolate. The cost of one battle ship would build this reservoir.

The citizens of Texas on one side of the river and of Mexico on the other have been deprived of the natural flow of the water of the Rio Grande River, when they most need it, for irrigation purposes in the spring and summer months, by the citizens of Colorado and New Mexico, who have taken out all the water flowing in the river by ditches and led it onto their own lands for irrigation purposes. They thus deprive their neighbors below, both Texans and Mexicans, of any water for irrigation, and crops can not be raised there without water.

Mexico has filed claims for damages against the United States for many millions of dollars for using all the water flowing in the river, to which the Mexicans claim a prescriptive right. The people of Texas are damaged in the same way as the Mexicans. Why should the United States neglect to build this reservoir and to let the citizens of Mexico have one-half the water impounded? Is it not better to use our money in doing a simple act of justice to a neighboring, friendly nation and in developing our own country than it is to raise a great standing army to conquer and annex the Philippine Islands?

If we would send an industrial army composed of the 100,000 men provided for in this bill to reclaim the 71,000,000 acres of arid land that we already own in the West, and arm them not with rifles and cannons, but with the implements of husbandry, with machinery, with spades and scrapers, with which to dam up rivers and streams, to dig ditches and canals to furnish water to irrigate this vast territory and turn it from a desert into the garden spot of our country, future generations would rise up and bless the Fifty-fifth Congress.

But if we fasten on the taxpayers a large standing army for purposes of conquering other nations and intermeddling with the affairs of the world, future generations will curse the Fifty-fifth Congress for entering into the imperialistic policy. Mr. Chairman, we have come to the Rubicon. Will this Congress cross this dreadful river of expansion and imperialism? Shall we change our name from the United States of America to the United States of America and Asia, and live by plundering weaker nations? May God save my countrymen from so great a crime.

The district I have the honor to represent in this House has more land above tide water than the whole of the Philippine Islands. My district has less than 3 persons to the square mile. The Philippine Islands have 60 persons to the square mile. My district has twenty times the room for expansion that the Philippine Islands have. The Geological Department estimates that the United States Government now own 71,000,000 acres of unreserved public lands that could be put under irrigation ditches. Mr. F. H. Newell, Chief of the Hydrographic Division of our Geological Survey, writing on the subject of Western irrigation, says:

One-third of the area of the United States is owned by the General Government, or about two-thirds of the territory between the one hundredth meridian and the Pacific coast. This land is the most fertile in the world, and water, the only thing which it lacks, can be supplied under proper irrigation. Four acres of land, producing from four to five crops a year, can support a family.

In nearly all of the arid regions irrigation is not only feasible, but has been proved successful. It is not always financially profitable to the private corporation looking for 8 per cent dividends; but in the same sense that a lighthouse, the dredging of a harbor, or the improvement of a river is profitable, it will pay the community or the General Government to open this great area for agricultural use, and so make it the comfortable home of millions of prosperous people.

About eight hundred millions of the people of the earth to-day are kept alive on irrigated land. It has been carried on successfully for many centuries in Egypt, China, India, Spain, and Hawaii. Would it not be a wise policy to develop our own waste lands and let the Filipinos keep their own lands and use them in their own way? There is no room there for our American people.

There are twenty times more people to the square mile in the Philippines than there are in the arid part of America. Taking the United States as a whole, we have only 21 people to the square mile, while the Philippine Islands have 60 to the square mile. These islands are now three times more densely populated than the United States. When California was purchased from Mexico she only had one inhabitant to the square mile; the Philippines have sixty times as many. A few years after California was purchased it was a State in the American Union.

To-day it is the home of several millions of our own race of people. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR] gives the purchase of California, for which we paid only $15,000,000, as a precedent to justify the purchase of the Philippines for $20,000,000.

If any better reason can be found for purchasing the Philippines this able debater would have found it. California could be purchased without destroying the Monroe doctrine. The subjugation of the Philippines will destroy it. California became a State in a few years. It is not the intention of the Republican imperialists that the Philippine Islands ever shall become a State in this Union. Only 2 per cent of the Filipinos are Europeans or Americans; and these islands never can be peopled by the white race—first, because of climatic conditions; and secondly, because white labor can not compete with the cheap labor of the yellow races of the Orient. Hence our laborers never can live in these islands or compete with these islanders.

Cheap Asiatic labor will raise sugar and hemp to come into our country free of duty and compete with our sugar-beet, cane, and hemp raisers, thus bringing our farmers in direct competition with the cooly labor of Asia. Our laws prevent Chinamen from coming to our country one at a time or by retail. If we annex the Philippines, we annex its present inhabitants, among whom are thousands of Chinamen, whom we will make citizens by the wholesale. The jewel of consistency seems to have been lost sight of in our mad rush for Spanish spoils. If we annex or attempt to annex these islands, Spain will be avenged, and the object of our greed will be our scourge and Spain's avenger.

Our flag has always been and should ever remain the emblem of peace, justice, and freedom. If we forcibly annex the Philippine Islands by war and conquest, our flag will then become the emblem of force, of war, of conquest, of greed and slavery.

The red will represent the blood shed in subduing the islands.

The white will represent the present Administration now engaged in the whitewashing business to cover up the mistakes made in that whited sepulcher—the White House—during the war with Spain.

The blue will represent the feelings of the American taxpayers when imperialism shall have doubled their taxes. The blue will also represent the Republican politician after the voters at the next Presidential election shall have retired their whitewashing chief to private life; shall have condemned imperialism, their standing-army steal, their gold standard, their trust-fostering policies, and their forcible annexation of the Philippines.

The Czar of Russia has recently proposed a general conference of nations for the purpose of securing a lasting peace, and the prevention of future wars, and a reduction of the present standing armies of the world. The Republican party is meeting this proposition by quadrupling our standing army, by ordering a number of our war ships and an army of men to the Philippine Islands for the purpose of forcibly annexing the islands to our Government.

Dewey was right in destroying the Spanish fleet, in capturing Manila, in driving out the Spaniards, and in holding Manila to force Spain to make a treaty of peace. These were war measures, and right and necessary. But we are now considering the problems of peace, not of war. The question is, Can we withdraw now from these islands honorably?

This question was answered by the President when he said that forcible annexation would be criminal aggression. If he was right then, he is wrong now. He now proposes to forcibly annex the Philippine Islands, and if war results from his proposed criminal aggression, then every Philippine Islander that dies fighting to prevent forcible annexation will be a martyr, and every drop of blood shed by our country to subjugate these people will be shed because we covet our neighbors' land. In such a war the United States would occupy the place held by Great Britain in our own Revolutionary war.

The Filipinos would occupy the position of Washington and the rebel colonists. We thus become the conquerors of a race of people who have never injured us, and whose only crime is their desire to be free. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR], on this floor a few days ago, said that if we left the Philippine Islands now, "coward" would be written on our backs. I had infinitely rather be branded "coward" on the back than "murderer" on the brow. If forcible annexation is criminal aggression, then the crime would be murder if we take human life in the war to annex the Philippines.

We fought the Revolutionary war with Great Britain because of her military despotism, because she quartered soldiers among us in times of peace, and because she taxed us without representation. Shall we now set up in the Philippine Islands a military despotism, quarter our troops among these people, tax them without representation, and shoot them down if they resist?

Washington and his rebels made our great Republic what it is to-day. They gave us a written Constitution to guide us. Washington, Jefferson, and Monroe warned us against foreign alliances and entanglements. Out of this advice arose the famous Monroe doctrine, by which we pledge ourselves that America is for Americans, and that no European nation shall annex any territory on this hemisphere. When France, during our civil war, invaded Mexico and put Maximilian on the throne, our Government asserted the Monroe doctrine and drove the French from Mexico.

Mr. Cleveland in his last Administration again asserted it against British aggression in Venezuela, and Great Britain yielded to his demands. By this doctrine we assume a protectorate over two of the five continents on earth. Surely two-fifths of this whole earth for expansion ground should satisfy the greed of the most rabid expansionist. Even the lion of Athens, the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR], who so generously brands every man opposed to the annexation of the Philippines as cowards, should be satisfied with two-fifths of the earth.

We declared war with Spain to free Cuba and give her a stable, republican form of government. Why should we treat the citizens of the Philippine Islands worse than the Cubans? Why give freedom to Cuba and make slaves of the Philippine Islanders? They were our allies and fought side by side with our troops at Manila. They hailed Dewey as their deliverer. Shall we turn their joy to sorrow by making him their conqueror?

The Times, an imperialistic journal published in this city, speaking of the Philippines, said on the 29th of last month:

> It has been decided to assert our authority at once. The insurgents will be compelled to choose between absolute submission, with the surrender of Iloilo, and war; of course the enemies of expansion will make the most of any compulsion regardless of the fact that it proves the folly of their scheme of independence.

This statement of the Times shows that the Republican party is following in the footsteps of Great Britain, and have abandoned the wise and patriotic teachings of the fathers of our Republic. In the early part of this century Great Britain demonetized silver. In 1873 the Republican party did likewise in this country. Great Britain has sent her armies and navy to every part of the earth and sought out the weak and unprotected nations and forcibly annexed them to the British Empire.

The Republican party now has an army and additional war vessels on the way to the Philippines to forcibly annex them. England has enslaved the Irish people. Not to be outdone by England, the Republican party now propose to first conquer and then govern according to their own sweet will the Filipinos, to whom the great God of this universe has given the inalienable right of self-government, or else our Declaration of Independence and our Constitution are a tissue of falsehoods. But let one of our generals testify to the fact that the imperialism of Great Britain has caused him to forget his country and to sneer at its Constitution. I will read from a New York paper the report of his speech:

SAYS WE HAVE OUTGROWN THE CONSTITUTION—GENERAL MERRITT SPEAKS AT THE ANNUAL DINNER OF THE NEW ENGLAND SOCIETY.

NEW YORK, December 22.

Over four hundred sons of New England sat down to-night at the ninety-third annual dinner of the New England Society of New York City at the Waldorf-Astoria. President Howland presided, and above his chair was the seal of the society, flanked on either side by the American and English flags. The guests included many men prominent in public and private life, among them being Brayton Ives, Elihu Root, J. P. Morgan, Joseph H. Choate, Gen. Hamilton S. Hawkins, Gen. William R. Shafter, Governor Elisha Dyer, of Rhode Island, Admiral William T. Sampson, Governor Theodore Roosevelt, Gen. Joseph Wheeler, Gen. Wesley Merritt, former Governor Roswell P. Flower, C. P. Huntington, and former Vice-President Levi P. Morton.

"Forefathers' Day" was responded to by Governor Dyer. Governor-elect Roosevelt was greeted with loud cheers when he rose to respond to "The State of New York." General Merritt, in the course of a short speech, said: "We have a great work before us. What we have done and what the Administration has done has been in the interests of the country. There is a great deal that approaches us from every side in the Tropics. We can extend our commerce there and we can extend the trade of America, which is now three-fourths of it limited to the Tropics, to an enormous extent. We have the English feeling with us when we are in the colonies of England. A great many people have insisted that the Constitution forbade it. To these I have said, 'We have outgrown the Constitution. It is not worth while to discuss it.' We are here and we are here to stay."

We should be too wise to adopt England's foreign policy and to thus destroy the Monroe doctrine and invite foreign wars and complications. We should be too alert to colonize a group of islands more than 7,000 miles from our shores, at the very doors of the nations of Europe, thus inviting an attack on ourselves so far away from home that our defeat and humiliation would be greatly facilitated. A chain is no stronger than the weakest link in the chain, and the weak link in our chain of empire would (if we adopt imperialism) be the Philippine Islands. We would have to protect them with every man, every gun, every ship, and every dollar that this country could command.

We would be taken at a great disadvantage. Our loss of life and treasure under such circumstances would be fearful if attacked by any strong European power. If we adhere to the Monroe doctrine and remain on this hemisphere, the combined powers of the world could not defeat our armies. Therefore, viewing the annexation of the Philippine Islands from the standpoint of expediency, we must reject them. Viewing it as a moral and social question, we must reject forcible annexation. Christianity would be a failure if we can make people good by fighting them.

Another objection to this bill is the enormous expense it will perpetually saddle on our people. Secretary Alger asks for the modest sum (modest, I mean, for a Republican) of about $166,000,000. The minority report on this bill estimates that if the bill passes it will cost the people of our country $150,000,000 per annum. Let us compare this expense with like expenses of other nations. Russia has a standing army of 1,000,000 men, and it costs her only $155,000,000 per year for all purposes, and less for each than any other country. France comes next, with 589,000 men, and spends for her army $145,000,000 per year.

Germany has an army of 585,000 men, which costs her $135,000,000 per year.

Austria-Hungary has an army of 360,000 men, that costs $90,000,000 a year.

Italy has an army of 270,000 men, that costs her $55,000,000.

These estimates, obtained from the Ohio State Journal, are for the Army alone and do not include the expenses of the Navy. According to Secretary Alger's request, we must pay $11,000,000 more for an army of 100,000 men than Russia does for 1,000,000 men. I therefore assert that this bill if passed should be styled a bill to perpetually rob the American people, to build up an American aristocracy, to overawe labor, and protect trusts and corporations, to provide offices for political pets and the sons of millionaires. It is my deliberate judgment that this bill is demanded by the moneyed interests of this country, who own and control the Republican party. Plutocrats claim that the Army is to be used in the Spanish islands. Plutocracy intends to use it in the sovereign States of this Union to enable capital to control and overawe labor. When this Army bill passes—then, and not until then, will the Administration unfold its foreign policy.

The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WALKER], a Republican, a banker and manufacturer, and, of course, an imperialist and expansionist, speaking of this bill on this floor, urged an increase of the Army, and said that it is needed, "not to keep in subjection law-abiding citizens, not to keep the workingmen from committing acts of violence when there are strikes, but to prevent those men who take advantage of strikes to do acts of violence in spite of the strikers, and to create a condition of war." This is a frank admission that the Army is intended to be used in the States and against our own people in case of strikes. And this is the real purpose of the advocates of this bill.

The spirit of imperialism and plutocracy is seeking to enslave the white citizens at home as well as to conquer and annex yellow ones in the islands of the ocean. The American people should be aroused to the great danger now confronting them in imperialism and a large standing army. What will it profit the people of the United States to conquer the Philippine Islands and annex the rest of the world if in the end they lose their own liberty?

The moneyed plutocrats have joined the Army aristocrats in an effort to raise the standing army to 100,000 men for their joint use and benefit, the moneyed men to control and coerce labor, the Army officers to draw large salaries for life and to live in luxury and ease at the taxpayers' expense. The annexed statement of Mr. Edward Atkinson, an expert statistician, shows that the mad policy of imperialism will soon bankrupt and ruin our country:

In the fiscal year ending June 30, 1897, deducting from the receipts the amounts recovered for bonds advanced to the Pacific railroad, and applied to the payment of those bonds and interest, the deficit was	$103,000,000
The Secretary computing the deficiency in the fiscal year ending June 30, 1899, at	112,000,000
Total	215,000,000

The proceeds of the war loan and $15,000,000 over will therefore have been expended within the six months after January 1, and on June 30, 1899, another deficit will be drawing cash from the Treasury reserves. This Congress will expire March 4, and the new Congress will not meet unless in extra session until December, 1899, in the middle of the fiscal year ending June 30, 1900.

The Secretary computing the revenue from taxation in the fiscal year ending

June 30, 1900, at	$510,000,000
Expenditures at	540,048,378
Deficit	30,048,378

The population for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1900, will be somewhat less then 78,000,000, but, adopting that number, the normal revenue and expenditure at $5 per head would come to $390,000,000.

According to the Secretary's estimate all the existing taxes will yield per head $6.52, while the computed expenditures will come to over $7 per head.

Additional taxation will therefore become necessary, even if the Secretary's sanguine estimates of revenue and expenditure are justified.

It will, however, be observed that he assumes that the revenues now derived from sugar and tobacco will continue as they are. But if the imperialist or annexation policy prevails, the islands of Cuba and Porto Rico can not be treated on any other basis than the Hawaiian group; hence a necessary loss of revenue in 1900, computed by myself at not less than 80 cents per head, or $62,000,000, to be added to the deficit computed by the Secretary of $30,000,000, making $92,000,000. This sum must be provided from new sources of direct internal taxation.

But it will be remembered that the Secretary's estimates of expenditure in the fiscal year ending June 30, 1900, are wholly inconsistent with the increase of the Army recommended by the Secretary of War or the increase of the Navy recommended by the Secretary of the Navy. Neither is any provision made in these estimates for the construction or renovation of coast defenses in Cuba, Porto Rico, or Hawaii, nor is there any provision made for public buildings in these islands. The Philippines are also wholly ignored.

The only safe computation that can be made for the fiscal year 1900, if the imperialist policy prevails, would be as follows:

Revenues as compiled by the Secretary	$510,000,000
Deduct loss of revenue on sugar, tobacco, rice, and fruits	62,000,000
Net revenue under existing laws, less loss on sugar, etc., at $6 per head, or $1 above the normal rate of $5	448,000,000

EXPENDITURES.

As per Secretary's estimate	540,000,000
Add for proposed increase of Army to 100,000 men, increase of Navy, coast defenses in Cuba, Porto Rico, and Hawaii, only $1 per head	78,000,000
Total at a fraction under $8 per head	618,000,000
Deficit	170,000,000

This deficit of over $2 per head must be provided by direct taxation.

78,000,000 persons taxed at $8 per head pay	$624,000,000
If taxed at the nominal rate of $5 per head, which has sufficed for twenty-one years, the sum would be	390,000,000
Cost of imperialism, $3 per head	234,000,000

This policy will raise the tax on every family of five persons from $25 to $40 a year.

But the whole cost is not even yet disclosed. The increase of the Army from 25,000 to 100,000 men can only contemplate service in Cuba, Porto Rico, and the Philippines of a force of at least 60,000 out of the 100,000, leaving 40,000 for home service where 25,000 have amply sufficed.

At least one-half the force of 60,000 will either die or become disabled every year. According to English experience in India and French experience in their tropical colonies of a death rate of 100 in each 1,000, 5 per cent will be sent home every year to be supported in hospitals or at the public cost from venereal diseases only, by which more than half the Army is infected.

Yet the Secretary of the Treasury reduces the estimate for pensions in 1900 below that of the present year. This can only be due to inadvertence, but how much must be added no one can compute.

In my previous guarded analysis I overestimated the income from the war-revenue act now in force. All my other computations are more than sustained by the report of the Secretary of the Treasury.

The money cost of the national crime which the advocates of imperialism propose to commit in the face of the declaration of President McKinley that such an act would be one of "criminal aggression" will be not less than $3 per head, $15 per family, in amount $234,000,000, in the next fiscal year, and probably more.

The pretexts upon which this so-called policy of imperialism is promoted consist of mixed motives of profits and patriotism.

Mr. JETT. I yield to the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. KITCHIN].

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Chairman, had I sufficient time I would gladly discuss the incidental race question which has been often mentioned in this debate, but, sir, I am compelled to limit my few remarks more closely to the main features of the pending measure. Scorning the misrepresentations of ignorance and bigotry, rejoicing in the victory of our Army and Navy, and responsible to the descendants of the first proclaimers of American liberty for my conduct, I shall vote against increasing the standing army of the United States from 30,000 to 100,000 men in time of peace.

The memories that cluster around the battle grounds of Alamance and Guilford, in my district, and the sacrifices made by my native State in the recent war with Spain, when brave Bagley fell at Cardenas and gallant Shipp expired on the hill of San Juan, impress me with honor for heroes and with respect for military preparations. But, sir, my knowledge of the conditions of the plain people of this land and my confidence in the innate powers of my country forbid my aid to this unnecessary increase of expense for military purposes in time of peace from $25,000,000 to $100,000,000 annually, a sum sufficient to buy three districts, according to their tax books, such as I have the honor here to represent. This increase has knocked at the doors of Congress for twenty years, but the wisdom and patriotism of our statesmen have refused it admittance; but under the infatuation resulting from our recent victories it has crept into these halls.

The King of Israel, in a moment of infatuation, yielded to temptation, committed a double crime, and in his old age mourned his conduct. Let Congress heed the moral and save the country from this error, sprung upon us in a moment of exultation, which our wisest and most honored statesmen have heretofore resisted.

Mr. Chairman, in the interest of millions we should deny the demands of the few, and we should continue in the future, as in the past, to rely upon the volunteer soldiery of this land for our safeguard.

Do gentlemen on the other side think that the treatment of the volunteer soldiers in this recent war will deter patriots from volunteering hereafter? In my judgment that treatment has been wrong. The volunteers upon application should be discharged and others should be enlisted for garrison work. The brave men who left their occupations and families to engage in active fighting for our country should not be required against their wishes to do garrison duty, to incur sickness, disease, and death under the tropical sun of distant Luzon. There are men who are willing to do garrison duty, and they should be allowed to enlist for that purpose. To keep the present volunteers in service to while away time and expend their manhood in garrisons is a violation of their contract as they understood it at the time of their enlistment.

However, hereafter when the rights of the people are involved, so strong is the patriotism and so high the courage of the citizenship of our land that gleaming steel will flash against the enemy from millions of volunteer soldiers if need be.

I think, Mr. Chairman, the result of the recent war with Spain clearly shows that this country does not need a large standing army. If for thirty years past we did not need a larger regular army than 30,000 men, why do we now need 100,000, when the Indian problem is well-nigh settled and when the victories of Manila and Santiago have added luster and prestige to our power? [Applause.]

If gentlemen take refuge behind the increased responsibilities of the war and convince the country that these responsibilities mean future wars, then, Mr. Chairman, the country will say at once, "Dispose of and withdraw from Porto Rico and Hawaii as well as from the Philippines."

In my opinion, danger, great danger lurks in the acquisition of the Philippines; and if the people thoroughly understood this matter, a wave of protest would come from the farms and the shops, the fields, the mines, and the offices of this land that would compel a patriotic Executive to change his course upon it. And I hope, Mr. Chairman, that even now, while we have this bill under consideration, these protests are making our administrative officers change their views upon the policy of annexing the Philippines.

If a just conception of the mission of this Republic, if a proper regard for the interests of our toiling masses, if a manly love for humanity's rights, are not sufficient to forbid the forcible annexation of these islands, then I trust the fear of the wrath of the American electors at least will stay the powers of the President in his grasping after Asiatic acquisitions.

It is futile for gentlemen on the other side to deny that the Executive has had the intention to permanently retain the Philippines.

Is there a lawyer here who would not expect to convict a defendant if he had the same evidence against him as we have in this matter in favor of that position being held by the Executive? Are we to suppose that our peace commissioners acted without any consultation with the Executive? Are we to suppose that a treaty of peace would be submitted to the Senate of the United States ceding the Philippines to our country without the consent of the Executive? Are we to suppose that the Executive would have made the speech that he made in a Southern city, in which he opposed "pulling down the flag," unless he had been sincere in his statements?

You will certainly not charge him with trying to involve the public in a misconception of his position by this treaty and by these expressions, and unless you think that he intended to mislead the people you can not resist the conclusion that when he made that speech at Atlanta he then intended to perpetually hold and occupy the Philippines. While the country knows this, yet the annexation proposition is so novel and perilous that so far not a single Republican has boldly advocated it in this House. Yet all Republicans, with few exceptions, are drifting with the Administration and submitting to this threatening innovation of imperialism.

Mr. Chairman, I would keep the necessary coaling and naval stations in the Philippine Islands, but never would I shed a drop of American blood in destroying the hopes of independence among their population.

I admit the right of this country to acquire vast domains of uninhabited or practically uninhabited American territory. I would go further than that. I would admit its right to annex populous adjacent territory, with the consent of the inhabitants thereof, as was done in the case of Texas; but I deny the moral right of any government, based upon the principles of our immortal Declaration of Independence, to purchase the opportunity to subdue 10,000,000 distant people who are struggling for the same rights that our ancestors wrung from British tyranny.

I protest against this Government undertaking these dangerous and expensive experiments while it shuts the Treasury to the rights of individuals and the needs of municipalities throughout this land. I protest against this threatened increase of the Regular Army as a menace to the rights of the States and the people in times of great moment, and we know not how soon those times may come. I protest against it as an unnecessary and therefore an unjust burden on the taxpayers of this country, who are now hoping for the early repeal of the present war taxes under which they are laboring. And I protest against it as a dangerous tendency to European or monarchic policies.

I wish that my distinguished colleague [Mr. LINNEY], who is rarely absent, were present, for I want also to protest against the "pussy cat" policy that my friend announced last night. I protest against our country elevating its back like a pussy cat, as my colleague demands, in order to keep the bulldogs of the world off of us.

Mr. CARMACK. We do not need to do so.

Mr. KITCHIN. We do not need to do so, as my friend from Tennessee remarks. On the contrary, I prefer to adhere to our fathers' policy in time of peace, to a standing army of 30,000 men, and to our Navy, and then in times of great emergency to depend upon the immeasurable resources, the indomitable courage, and the never-failing patriotism of the best people that the world has ever seen, for our defense, our strength, and our victories.

Mr. Chairman, gentlemen say we should not withdraw the flag. I would remind gentlemen that the German flag was withdrawn from the capital of France without dishonor; that the English flag was withdrawn from this very city in which we are without dishonor; that the American flag was withdrawn from the capital of Mexico without dishonor; and, more than that, I would remind them that the American flag was withdrawn from Pensacola, when Pensacola was Spanish, without dishonor. And, sir, I protest against the claptrap and humbug argument embraced in the question, "Who will pull down the flag?" and would answer that common sense and the welfare of our posterity demand that we withdraw from the Philippines at the earliest practicable moment, and not run the risk of fighting another war, a war which this Congress has not authorized, which the people do not approve, and which, with its succeeding evils, will be properly charged to this Administration.

The objects of the first war—the independence of Cuba and the avenging of the Maine—have been attained. If further bloodshed follows it will be upon the heads of those who have persisted and still persist in forcing our flag upon the Filipinos against their consent.

In conclusion I will say, in the sentiments that I have heretofore expressed on this floor, that if Dewey's great victory at Manila shall result in our country abandoning the principles of our fathers, shall result in the policy of imperialism, in a policy of territorial aggrandizement and colonial oppression, then the sweetness of that victory will be bitterness, the honor of that victory will be shame, and humanity may weep over it as the first blow by the country of Washington and Jefferson against the liberty of mankind, and may well pray that it prove not fatal. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. JETT. Mr. Chairman, I now yield to the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. STARK].

Mr. STARK. Mr. Chairman, the discussion upon this bill has very properly taken a wide range. A measure which proposes basic alterations in the system of government and established usage of the United States of America demands the exercise of our best thought and most critical discernment. The question directly submitted is whether in time of peace there is need to permanently increase our Regular Army to 100,000 men immediately after the conclusion of a war with Spain which required the active services of less than 60,000 men. The adoption of the substitute for the bill under discussion will provide sufficient military force until the conclusion of all differences with Spain.

In the earlier days of the Republic the laurel wreath of fame was placed upon the brows of brave men who left shops and fields at the call of their country, performed their full duty as soldiers, and when peace was declared resumed their places at the anvil or "beat their swords into plowshares," to again become producers and artisans. We are proud of our citizen soldiery. They have never failed us in our hours of need. The volunteer soldier of the United States has risen to every emergency and "acted well his part" whenever called into service.

I believe, in the language of the Constitution, that "a well-regulated militia is necessary to the security of a free state," and that a well-regulated, well-drilled, and well-equipped militia will be perfectly adequate without further increase of the standing Army to answer every requirement of a Government that seeks only the good of its citizens, endeavors simply to execute the laws duly passed by the representatives of the people, and accords to other nations, weak or strong, the same treatment we have always asked for ourselves. It is my judgment that a greater appropriation to arm and equip the militia of the various States would effectively guard the Republic from any threatened danger and relieve the people from any apprehensions regarding the permanent establishment of an unnecessary military force or power.

As regards the question of "imperialism," with which this seems intimately connected, I apprehend there is little doubt that the provisions of the Constitution of the United States apply at once to all territory that becomes a part of the United States. This seriously affects our revenue and the industries of our people. It would be impossible to levy discriminating duties against their products, and the capital of the world can employ their semislave labor to the disadvantage of American workmen and farmers. As soon as the West and South realize that this policy diverts immigration and capital to the islands of the Pacific, and that development of their industries and the rise of land values are checked in consequence, it will have few adherents in either section.

The North and the distinctively manufacturing centers have begun to realize the trend of the intended legislation, and the protests of their representatives are being recorded. People are set to thinking by self-interest, and it requires but little thought to show the average man that the doctrines of "conquest" and "colonization" are foreign to the spirit of American institutions. There is as much of an "irrepressible conflict" between a government by "consent" and a government by "coercion" as has existed between freedom and serfdom since the first aristocrat conceived the idea of living in the sweat of some other man's face.

What is taxation without representation but a system of "involuntary servitude?" And it has been decreed after due submission to the grim arbitrament of war, it has been solemnly recorded by that court of highest resort, an earnest and awakened people, that from and after the passage of the thirteenth amendment "neither slavery nor involuntary servitude, except as a punishment for crime whereof the party shall have been duly convicted, shall exist within the United States or any place subject to their jurisdiction."

I know there are men who seem to be trying to create the impression that human liberties, national honor, and the great principles of justice are empty, meaningless phrases, to be juggled with and canted over until the distinction between right and wrong is entirely obliterated, and the doctrine of "manifest destiny" has been deftly substituted for the teachings of the Sermon on the Mount. To such the quotation from Lowell is strikingly applicable;

> Think you truth a farthing rushlight to be pinched out when you will
> With your deft official fingers and your politician's skill?
> Is your God a wooden fetich to be hidden out of sight,
> That his dull eyes may not see you do the thing that is not right?

It is easy to write the word "relinquished," as applied to Spanish dominion in Cuba, and "ceded" in the treaty provisions concerning the islands of the other hemisphere. It is easy to designate forcible annexation as "criminal aggression" when applied to Cuba, and "benevolent assimilation" in speaking of the Philippines, but are not the rights of these alien people identical. If either is to be discriminated against, why should it be the race of whom Admiral Dewey in his cablegram of August 28, 1898, said:

> These people are far superior in their intelligence and more capable of self-government than the natives of Cuba, and I am familiar with both races.

Since July 4, 1776, certain great political theorems have been graven on the page of history by the people of the United States of America. "Taxation without representation is tyranny." "Resistance to tyranny is obedience to God." "All men are born free and equal, and endowed by their Creator with certain inalienable rights." "Governments derive their just powers from the consent of the governed." These are trite truths. Perhaps a little old-fashioned, but they have been held up to the children of America as worthy of acceptance for more than a hundred years. Who will take them down? [Applause.]

Mr. JETT. Mr. Chairman, I now yield to the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. LAMB].

[Mr. LAMB addressed the committee. See Appendix.]

Mr. JETT. I now yield to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. STALLINGS].

[Mr. STALLINGS addressed the committee. See Appendix.]

Mr. JETT. I now yield to the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. MAXWELL] fifteen minutes, or such time as he may desire.

Mr. MAXWELL. Mr. Chairman, the pioneer settlers of this country favored peace. The Puritans sought to establish a new home, where they would be free from the persecutions of their enemies. Connecticut and Rhode Island were settled by those who sought freedom to worship God as they saw fit. These settlements and others aroused the jealousy of the Indians, then very numerous and strong, and who saw that the inevitable result, if the whites were permitted to take possession of their lands, would be their own extinction. Hence bloody wars followed, and the settlers were compelled to defend their homes. It was a matter of self-defense alone, although at times aggressive.

Early in the seventeenth century the French made settlements at Quebec and along the St. Lawrence, and had established trading posts along that river, around the Great Lakes, in the valley of the Ohio, and down the Mississippi, and claimed the entire country as a colony of France. Hence Indian raids upon the frontier settlements of New England, New York, and other colonies, apparently instigated by the French, were of frequent occurrence until the French were driven out of Canada. In all these wars settlers were mustered in as soldiers, although but militia, to defend their homes, and were brave, daring, and reliable.

Braddock's defeat, bad as it was, would have been an utter rout had not the Virginia troops, practically the militia of that colony, under the command of Washington, protected the rear. These colonists were jealous of their rights as freemen. Our fathers were opposed to tyranny in whatever form or by whom exercised. Hence, when it was sought by the English Parliament to impose taxes upon them when they had no voice in the election of its members and no representation, they rebelled. And the fact that the taxes to be raised in this manner were to be applied on the debt incurred by the English Government in driving the French out of Canada was held not to change the principle.

If Parliament could levy taxes upon the colonies for one purpose when they had no representation in that body, then they could levy them for all purposes and practically reduce them to the condition of a conquered people. If they submitted to this injustice, it would be but the beginning of British tyranny, and we glory in their manhood and courage and are thankful to them for their resistance and to God for the success of the Revolution that created this nation. In this connection it may be well to inquire if we are seeking to impose taxes without representation on any of the late colonies of Spain. The Declaration of Independence contains the clearest and most direct statement of the rights of men to be found in any state paper.

It is the foundation upon which this Government is placed, and the Constitution of the United States was framed and adopted to more effectually secure the blessings of liberty, and the Constitution itself is to be construed with reference to the Declaration of Independence. This Declaration has, since its promulgation, been a beacon light to every people who desire to be free. It is the watchword that points the way to liberty, and when carried into effect by any people will secure the downfall of tyranny and oppression. In connection with this Declaration of Independence, the long and arduous services of Washington in conducting the war to a successful termination and then voluntarily surrendering his power to those from whom he received it, stating that he made no charge for his services, was an example of patriotism and disinterestedness that commended him and the new Republic to every friend of the human race.

Byron, in writing after the battle of Waterloo, in commending Washington and the Republic, said:

> Can tyrants but by tyrants conquered be,
> And freedom find no champion and no child
> Such as Columbia saw when she > Sprang forth a Pallas armed but undefiled?
> Or must such minds be nourished in the wild,
> Deep in the unpruned forest, 'midst the roar
> Of cataracts,
> Where nature smiled on infant Washington;
> Has earth no more
> Such seed within her breast, or > Europe no such shore?

In his address in September, 1796, Washington said, in speaking of the duty of the nation:

> Observe good faith and justice toward all nations; cultivate peace and harmony with all. Religion and morality enjoin this conduct; and can it be that good policy does not equally enjoin it? It will be worthy of free and enlightened (and at no distant period a great) nation to give to mankind the magnanimous and too novel example of a people always guided by an exalted justice and benevolence. Who can doubt that in the course of time and things the fruits of such plan would richly repay a temporary advantage which might be lost by a steady adherence to it?—Bancroft's Life, page 498.

In the same address he also said (page 498):

> The great rule of conduct for us in regard to foreign nations is in extending our commercial relations to have with them as little political connection as possible. So far as we have already formed engagements, let them be performed with perfect good faith. Here let us stop. Europe has a set of primary interests which to us have none or very remote relations. Hence she must be engaged in the frequent controversies, the causes of which are essentially foreign to our concerns. Hence, therefore, it must be unwise in us to implicate ourselves by artificial ties in the ordinary vicissitudes of her politics, or the ordinary combinations and collisions of her friendships or enmities. Our detached and distant situation enables us to pursue a different course.

He also says (page 496):

> So likewise a passionate attachment of one nation for another produces a variety of evils. Sympathy for the favorite nation facilitating the illusion of an imaginary common interest in cases where no real common interest exists, and infusing into one the enmities of the other, betrays the former into a participation of the quarrels of the latter without adequate inducement or justification. It leads also to concessions to the favorite nation of privileges denied to others which is apt doubly to injure the nation making the concessions by unnecessarily parting with what ought to have been retained, and by exciting jealousy, ill-will, and disposition to retaliate in the parties from whom equal privileges are withheld; and it gives to ambitious, corrupted, or deluded citizens who devote themselves to the favorite nation facility to betray or sacrifice the interest of their own country without odium, sometimes even with popularity; gilding with the appearances of a virtuous sense of obligation a commendable deference to public opinion, or a laudable zeal for the public good the base of foolish compliances of ambition, corruption, or infatuation.

As avenues to foreign influence in innumerable ways, such attachments are particularly alarming to the truly enlightened and independent patriot. How many opportunities do they afford to tamper with domestic factions and practice the arts of seduction to mislead public opinion to influence or awe public councils? Such an attachment of a small or weak toward a great and powerful nation dooms the former to be the satellite of the latter. Against the insidious wiles of foreign influence, I conjure you to believe me, fellow-citizens, the jealousy of a free people ought to be constantly awake, since history and experience prove that foreign influence is one of the most baneful foes of a republican government.

These declarations of the future of the Republic are peculiarly applicable now for reasons that will be stated presently. Before the declaration of war against Spain last year, it was well known that Spain in the conduct of the war against the people of the island of Cuba had resorted to inhuman methods that shocked the sensibilities of our people, and as it was probable that this inhuman mode of warfare would continue indefinitely, there was a general demand on the part of our people that the war should stop. Acting upon this demand of our people, Congress, before a formal declaration of war, in effect declared war against Spain, and in the very act itself solemnly announced to the world that we "disclaimed any disposition or intention to exercise sovereignty, jurisdiction, or control over said island," except for the purpose of pacification, and when that was accomplished we would withdraw. In the first section of the bill we declared "that the people of Cuba are and of a right ought to be free."

The sole object of the bill was to compel the Spaniards to surrender their authority and get out of Cuba and leave the people of that island free to form a government of their own. This voluntary act was precisely like that of a neighbor who would assist another in distress with no thought or expectation of compensation. Had it been intended that this nation should be reimbursed for its expenses, a provision of that kind would have been put in the bill. There certainly was no suggestion of the kind either in the bill itself or on the floor of the House. The fair inference from our declarations as a nation is that the war was not waged for conquest but for humanity.

Porto Rico and the Philippine Islands were not mentioned, or, so far as I know, thought of. All these islands are thickly populated, much more so than Cuba, and the very act of declaring that the Cubans of right ought to be free and independent applies with greater force to Porto Rico and the Philippine Islands. According to our best information the Philippine Islands contain about 114,000 square miles and about 10,000,000 population, and the ratio of population per square mile in Porto Rico, I am informed, is about the same. How can we demand government of the people for Cuba and deny it to the other islands named? We can not do so without stultifying ourselves.

If we are to be indemnified by Spain, let us insist upon payment of an indemnity in money. The plea that she is unable to pay can not be sustained. France, a few years ago, when prostrate at the feet of her conquerors, raised $1,000,000,000 as an indemnity to Germany. The national debt of France was very large at the time, but she had no difficulty in raising the amount demanded. And there is good reason to believe that Spain could raise the requisite amount. I think we have already expended in this war at least $200,000,000, and it is proposed to pay Spain for the Philippines $20,000,000; and what do we get in return? Practically nothing. There are supposed to be about 700 islands, big and little, in the Philippines. With this vast number the expense of policing the islands would be enormous, even if the natives were friendly; but if hostile, it would be greatly increased. The natives, as a rule, know nothing of our language, religion, or form of government, and are pagans, Mohammedans, and followers of Confucius. They wear but little clothing, and live almost wholly on the food of the Tropics. Will anyone contend that such a people is a valuable acquisition to any nation? I think not. The life of one of our soldiers or seamen is worth more to us than the islands.

As a nation we have the high sense of honor possessed by Washington, and I trust we will not depart from the ancient landmarks. But it is said our Army is already in the Philippine Islands and that it is confronted by a large force of the natives, who claim to have set up a government of their own. The answer to this is that we have no cause of war against the natives of those islands. Our troops were sent there to drive out the Spaniards, not to make war on the people. It is said, however, that these people are not fit to govern themselves and we should hold the islands as colonies, and we are referred to Great Britain, which, it is said, has added greatly to her power and wealth by reason of her colonies and conquests.

Her rule in India, if reports apparently reliable can be credited, has been that of an absolute tyrant. The people have no voice in the government, and no salaried offices of importance are given to the natives. She rules India with a rod of iron, and while she has made many improvements there calculated to benefit the country, they have been made as investments and not as works of charity and good will to the people. But five years ago the council of state for India in London, without notice, in one day closed India's mints, discredited the money which had been almost exclusively in use from time immemorial, and caused intense suffering, sickness, starvation, and death among the poor.

Do the people of this country desire such colonies? If so, the plea should be placed on other grounds than humanity. But it is said that Great Britain is exceedingly anxious to have us hold the Philippines, and that her statesmen and public journals are doing all they can to promote this desire among our people, and that British influence all over this nation is being exerted in that behalf. If so, I commend the words of Washington which I have quoted to the attention of Congress and the American people. We wish to remain on friendly terms with England, as with all other nations, but to have no entangling alliances with her or any other nation.

One of the evil effects of annexation would be the influx of cheap labor from the Philippines. Being territory of the United States, their right to pass from State to State could not be denied. We are all interested in having labor well paid for its service, as a man or woman who receives enough to provide comfortably for his or her family and lay up something for a rainy day is a better citizen every way; and when all are employed at fair wages the country is prosperous. We sometimes hear it said that certain industries can be carried on successfully if wages can be reduced to a certain level. The proper mode of estimating such things would seem to be to fix wages at a fair rate and then make deductions as far as possible in other things. But we are gravely told that we need our Army of 100,000 men to meet any exigency that may arise.

The next census of this nation, to be taken next year, will show from 75,000,000 to 78,000,000 people herein, and in the next ten years we will in all probability pass the 90,000,000 mark. We have unbounded resources, and our people are active, industrious, intelligent, and patriotic, and ready at any time to defend the flag if occasion requires. No nation in the world can cope with us in a just cause. France has a population of about 40,000,000, and the birth rate is but little in excess of the death rate. Germany has a population of about 50,000,000; Austria-Hungary of 41,000,000. Russia, 113,000,000, and the British Isles nearly 40,000,000. In point of numbers Russia is the only nation that equals or exceeds ours, but she is deficient in both money and resources, and lacks the cohesion among her population possessed by ourselves. Of the other nations Great Britain is the only one that would be formidable, but she would have to succumb, and that speedily, to the young giant of the West. But we have no desire to go to war.

This is a Christian nation, and the Golden Rule is the standard of the highest character. We intend to treat every other nation courteously, fairly, and honorably. If our nation could be personified by the character of one individual, it would be that of a peaceable, active, intelligent, industrious, enterprising, reliable, honorable, and upright gentleman. We propose to give no cause of offense, and be honorable in our dealings, and anticipate no war. We have nothing to fear from the Indians in the United States. At the present time they are all on reservations or on their allotments of land, and need no troops to hold them in subjection. A standing army is always a menace to free government, and in a republic should not be maintained in time of peace. I admire the bravery and efficiency of our Regular Army, and I am in favor of a sufficient number of regular soldiers that the service may demand.

I think, notwithstanding the disparaging remarks as to its organization, that it will compare favorably with the army of any other nation. And in my view its organization, effected by our able generals, men skilled in the art of war, and that have made the Army strong and efficient, should not be radically changed for untried experiment. A free people, however, must rely upon volunteers in case an army is required. A volunteer soldiery possesses an energy, dash, vim, and staying qualities that are hard to excel. The volunteers tender their services to the Government for the purpose of fighting in the war in which the nation is engaged, and may be relied upon to use every effort to secure a victory. Cromwell, with his volunteers, although not so well drilled as the troops opposed to him, overcame the regular army under Charles I, and the volunteers in our civil war and the late war with Spain were brave, active, intelligent, efficient, reliable, and intensely patriotic.

Let a just cause of war arise between this nation and any other and a million men would spring to arms at once for offense or defense. But we will have no war with any other nation, and our people are law abiding, and it is unnecessary to have an army to preserve the peace or enforce the law. In the early history of this nation, when the Indians, in armed bands many thousands strong, attacked our frontier settlements, carrying murder and devastation wherever they went, and foreign foes were threatening the nation from without, we had but a skeleton of a regular army, the principal reliance being the citizen soldiery, and it performed its duty well and restored peace to the nation. [Applause.]

Three thousand years ago a prophet declared that after a certain time the nations should study war no more. Now, on the eve of the twentieth century, the prophecy seems in a fair way to be fulfilled, and a desire exists among the nations to settle differences by arbitration, and there is a probable reduction of armies of the several nations in the near future. I hope we will not impede the march of universal peace. Our nation can easily support half a billion population. Our resources, which are almost without limit, are but beginning to be developed. We have exhaustless mines of gold, silver, iron, copper, and other minerals, and oils without limit. The waters which flow from the Rocky Mountains, if utilized for irrigation, would irrigate a large part of the semiarid lands of the nation, and an amount of money equal to that spent in this war with Spain would accomplish this result and add greatly to our production.

There are grave questions in our own nation to be settled in the near future that require wise statesmanship and dispassionate action. Let us see to it that our laws are just and equal, and are administered with impartiality and fairness, and that the rights of all and every class of citizens are fostered and protected, and our own people will be prosperous and happy without being embroiled in the contentions and controversies of other nations. [Applause.]

Mr. JETT. Mr. Chairman, I now yield to the gentleman from California [Mr. CASTLE].

Mr. MARSH. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The petitioners do not believe the American people have suddenly become so bloodthirsty or intoxicated with power, or filled with the lust of dominion, nor that they are ready to reverse all their own history or dishonor all the declarations which their fathers have made. They deem that it would be a crime for them to keep silent at this crisis, and they respectfully pray that the Senate of the United States will act upon these doctrines.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The petition will be referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Resolved, That for this purpose the Secretary of War is hereby authorized and instructed to appoint as commissioner for this service any retired officer of the United States Corps of Engineers who may be available, at a rate of compensation to be fixed by the President, and that such commissioner shall be empowered to select and appoint such engineers, clerks, and other assistants and upon such terms as may be necessary to enable him to comply with the conditions of this resolution, the expense for such commissioner to be provided for from any unexpended balance appropriated to the sundry civil service of the United States.

ACQUISITION OF TERRITORY.

Mr. SPOONER. Mr. President, I desire to give notice that Wednesday next, after the routine business of the Senate, I will, if it suits the convenience of the Senate, submit some observations upon the general question covered by the joint resolution introduced by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST] and the resolutions of the Senator from Illinois [Mr. MASON], the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR], and the Senator from Georgia [Mr. BACON].

Mr. COCKRELL. When?

Mr. SPOONER. On Wednesday morning after the routine business. I shall have to be absent between now and then for a couple of days.

Mr. RAWLINS. Mr. President, I desire to give notice that on Thursday next, at the expiration of the morning business, I shall address the Senate on the subject of the resolutions in regard to expansion.

GOVERNMENT OF FOREIGN PEOPLE.

Mr. MASON. According to the notice I gave yesterday, I desire to ask simply for a vote upon the resolution I introduced. I do not wish to interfere or delay the remarks that may be made by the Senator from New York [Mr. PLATT]. If it is agreeable, I will now ask unanimous consent that on Tuesday at 1 o'clock the vote may be taken.

Mr. CARTER. Will not that interfere with the notice given by the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. SPOONER]?

Mr. MASON. No; his notice is that he will speak on Wednesday next.

Mr. CARTER. If the vote is to be taken prior to that time, I suggest that it would be useless for the Senator to address his remarks upon the resolution.

Mr. BERRY. I gave notice that I would speak on Tuesday morning. However, if the Senator from Illinois can get unanimous consent for a vote on his resolution at that time, I will withhold my speech until after the vote can be taken.

Mr. MASON. I will change the request, then. I ask unanimous consent that we agree to vote upon the resolution on Friday, one week from to-day, at the hour of 1 o'clock.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Unanimous consent is asked by the Senator from Illinois that on Friday next, a week from to-day, at 1 o'clock, the vote shall be taken on Senate resolution 445, declaring it to be the policy of the United States not to attempt to govern the people of any other country without the consent of the people themselves. Is there objection?

Mr. BACON. I understand that we would have the right to offer amendments under that agreement.

Mr. MASON. Yes, sir; there is no doubt of that. I shall not object to any amendments being offered.

Mr. BACON. That is my only purpose in rising. I do not understand that that order would permit any debate, but it would give the right of amendment.

Mr. MASON. Certainly.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The right of amendment without debate.

Mr. MASON. I shall not insist upon anything that is not agreeable.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection?

Mr. CARTER. I object.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Objection is made.

GOVERNMENT OF THE PHILIPPINE ISLANDS.

Mr. HOAR. I ask unanimous consent that on Friday next, at 1 o'clock, a vote shall be taken on the resolution offered by me, namely, that the people of the Philippine Islands are, and of right ought to be, free and independent.

Mr. CHANDLER. I should like to ask the Senator from Massachusetts a question in this connection. Would consent given in that form prevent a motion to lay the resolution on the table?

Mr. HOAR. No.

Mr. CHANDLER. I would not agree to it unless that motion were applicable.

Mr. HOAR. I understand that it is applicable.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Can the Senator state the Calendar number of his resolution?

Mr. MASON. Mr. President——

Mr. HOAR. Let the question be put on the unanimous consent asked by me, if the Senator is willing.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair is trying to find the Calendar number of the resolution.

Mr. HOAR. The Calendar number can be found afterwards. It is a well-known resolution.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Massachusetts asks unanimous consent that on Friday next, a week from to-day, at 1 o'clock, the vote shall be taken on the resolution offered by him

Mr. HOAR. And any amendments pending, of course.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. And any amendments that may then be offered. It is Senate resolution 464, offered by the Senator from Massachusetts, declaring that the people of the Philippine Islands of right ought to be free and independent, etc. Is there objection?

Mr. CARTER. Mr. President, I understand the fact to be that this resolution and other resolutions of a kindred nature were presented to the Senate and are now upon the table as texts to which Senators may address remarks and submit their views with reference to the general questions involved. Remarks have been made from day to day very largely by Senators in sympathy with the resolutions. It is but proper and just, it seems to me, that these resolutions should remain on the table until a late day in the session for the purpose of permitting all Senators desiring to do so to express their views upon the general questions involved, there not being any matter of public policy or an immediate necessity requiring a vote at an early date. I therefore object, Mr. President.

Mr. HOAR. Mr. President, I desire to give notice that if we are not to be permitted to have a vote on these resolutions—of course, any Senator who wishes to speak upon them will have an opportunity to present such resolutions as he himself may frame and speak upon them—if we are not to have an opportunity to vote on this question, which seems to me the great and immediate practical question of this year and generation, I give notice that I shall insist on keeping my resolution, or that of the Senator from Illinois if he prefers, as his has precedence in point of suggestion, constantly before the Senate in every morning hour until voted on.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I wish to make a parliamentary inquiry as to how the Senator from Massachusetts can do that under the rules of the Senate. He can introduce a new resolution each day, but certainly he can not under a threat or in any other way keep a resolution of this kind permanently before the Senate.

Mr. HOAR. He can until it is acted on.

Mr. GALLINGER. Not at all. It goes to the Calendar.

Mr. HOAR. If it fills up the morning hour it goes to the Calendar, of course. I propose, Mr. President, to see whether there is some right left to the Senate of the United States; I will not say to the minority, because I believe the majority of the Senate believe in the doctrine of this resolution.

Mr. CARTER. Mr. President, I can not but view with regret the apparent feeling manifested by the Senator from Massachusetts in view of the objection here made to the fixing of a time for a vote upon his resolution. It will be readily conceded and nowhere controverted that the questions intended to be covered by the resolutions now pending present most momentous and far-reaching propositions for the consideration of the Senate and the consideration of the American people at large. I am sure that it is not the desire of the Senator from Massachusetts to have such questions disposed of on partial consideration.

It is well known that the present session of Congress, limited in time, well spent, in fact, has before it a large amount of very important and pressing legislative measures to be disposed of. The appropriation bills have scarcely been touched. A census bill must be passed before this Congress adjourns. Legislation for the great district of Alaska must be perfected, which is both voluminous and vitally important to the large number of our citizens assembled in that section of the country.

Now, Mr. President, after the lapse of two or three weeks of desultory debate, some Senators having been thoroughly prepared, other Senators listening from day to day to the arguments being presented for and against the proposition embraced in the several resolutions, it seems to me unjust to those Senators who have been engrossed in the current legislation of the day, finding it impossible to devote the necessary time to the close work of preparing an address upon which they are willing to stand before the country and before history on the subject, that they shall, when no immediate public necessity requires the sacrifice, overburden themselves and neglect other important duties for the purpose of preparing their views for submission to the Senate and the country within the next week, if you please.

Where a vote is sought to be fixed by unanimous consent, I have never known that consent to be refused in this Chamber when the public necessities require that an early date should be fixed for a decision of the question pending. This question is largely, as at present presented, an abstract question.

It has been sought to make it appear to the country, and to Congress as well, that the determination of the questions involved in these resolutions must be reached before the treaty now pending before the Senate can be properly disposed of. This position tends to mix important questions and unnecessarily to confuse the minds of members of this body, and the minds of the greater body outside of this Chamber, with reference to the real questions to be disposed of in the disposition of the treaty now pending.

There is no necessary connection, nor can any connection be properly shown, I assume, between the ratification of a treaty of peace and a determination of the question as to what the conscience and the judgment of the Congress and the country will be with that piece of territory which may become ours by and through the ratification of the treaty of peace.

The matter of the future disposition in a legislative way of the Philippine Islands, Porto Rico, and Cuba rests with the Congress of the country, and it is not necessary, I assume, that we should allow the question of peace or war to hang in the balance, to be disposed of only by a resolution declaring what a majority of this body, without consulting another body that has something to say with reference to public affairs, may feel disposed to do at some future time with reference to a part of the territory that falls to us through the fortunes of war.

I shall, Mr. President, in the exercise of a right which I do not believe I will at any time abuse, constantly object to a final vote upon these resolutions until every Senator upon this floor shall have submitted his views and shall have had ample time so to do, if it is his desire to be heard by the Senate and the country.

To attempt to force a vote upon this question, to attempt to remove a resolution which presents merely an abstraction for the purposes of debate, seems to me to be pressing a matter forward to a final disposition upon partial consideration, and that it savors of unfairness to attempt to do it.

Mr. BACON and Mr. MASON addressed the Chair.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Georgia.

Mr. CHANDLER. Is the morning business concluded?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senate was proceeding under the call of concurrent and other resolutions when the unanimous-consent agreement was asked.

Mr. CHANDLER. I ask for the immediate consideration of a resolution calling for information.

Mr. GALLINGER. I did not understand that the order of reports of committees had been closed.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. It has been closed, and the order of concurrent and other resolutions was taken up.

GEN. JOHN M. PALMER.

Mr. GALLINGER. I ask unanimous consent out of order to present a favorable report from the Committee on Pensions, to which I call the attention of the senior Senator from Illinois [Mr. CULLOM].

I am directed by the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. 5342) granting a pension to John M. Palmer, to report it with an amendment in the nature of a substitute, and submit a report thereon.

Mr. CULLOM. I believe that is the unanimous report of the Committee on Pensions, and, in view of the facts connected with the case, which are set forth in the report somewhat, I shall be very glad indeed if the Senate will allow the bill to be put upon its passage. I make that request.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill just reported from the Committee on Pensions by the Senator from New Hampshire?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The amendment of the Committee on Pensions was, to strike out all after the enacting clause and insert:

That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension roll the name of John M. Palmer, late major-general, United States Army, and pay him a pension at the rate of $100 per month.

Mr. SEWELL. I ask the Senator in charge of the bill whether it should not read "United States Volunteers?"

Mr. GALLINGER. Yes; "Volunteers." That is right.

Mr. CULLOM. I think that is correct.

Mr. GALLINGER. It should read, "late major-general, United States Volunteers." I move that amendment.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. THURSTON presented a resolution of the senate of the State of Nebraska, praying for the passage of the bill granting a pension to Gen. John M. Palmer, of Illinois; which was ordered to lie on the table.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Georgia [Mr. BACON] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. BACON. I understand that the Senator from New York [Mr. PLATT] has given notice that he desires to address the Senate this morning, and I shall occupy the attention of the Senate only a minute in view of that fact.

Mr. CHANDLER. Will the Senator from New York allow me to offer a resolution which I desire to have acted upon?

Mr. PLATT of New York. Certainly.

Mr. BACON. What is the request of the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. CHANDLER. It is a resolution of inquiry, and is a part of the morning business which I desire to have passed.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The resolution will be received.

NAVY PAY TABLE.

Mr. CHANDLER submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Navy be directed to transmit to the Senate a statement giving the present Navy pay table for officers above the warrant officers and stating in a column to the right of each amount specified for an officer when on leave or waiting orders, the pay which said officer will receive if his pay is changed to the pay now given to the corresponding officer in the Army; and stating in additional columns the amounts which the officer will from time to time, through longevity, receive as his total annual pay; and stating also in an additional column the annual money allowance which the officer will receive for commutation of quarters excluding any allowance for forage; and also inform the Senate whether or not a naval officer receiving pay and allowances at the Army rate will receive a greater amount for pay and allowances when on shore duty than when at sea, and that the Secretary be further directed to inform the Senate whether in his opinion the existing differences between sea pay, shore-duty pay, and leave or waiting-orders pay, should be abolished.

DISTINCTIVE PAPER FOR BONDS AND NOTES.

Mr. PETTIGREW submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby directed to send to the Senate all facts in his possession in connection with the adoption of the distinctive paper upon which United States bonds and notes are printed; and also all facts in his possession concerning the letting of the first contract for a supply of such distinctive paper, in the year 1879.

POLICY REGARDING THE PHILIPPINE ISLANDS.

Mr. SULLIVAN. I submit a resolution which I desire to have read, printed, and laid on the table.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate of the United States, That the ratification of the pending treaty of peace with Spain shall in no wise determine the policy to be pursued by the United States in regard to the Philippines, nor shall it commit this Government to a colonial policy; nor is it intended to embarrass the establishment of a stable, independent government by the people of those islands, whenever conditions make such a proceeding hopeful of successful and desirable results.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. As suggested by the Senator from Mississippi, the resolution will lie on the table and be printed.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, I have only a word to say. While I intended to submit some remarks somewhat in reply to what the Senator from Montana [Mr. CARTER] has said in connection with the resolutions concerning which I have given notice for to-morrow, in view of the time which has passed and the desire of the Senator from New York to proceed, I will withhold what I had to say.

Mr. MASON. I understand that the unfinished business is the resolution which I have asked unanimous consent shall be voted upon one week from to-day. I desire, in order not to interrupt the Senator from New York, simply to give notice that I shall ask at the close of the morning business to-morrow to take up the resolution for passage.

I wish to say one word in reply to the Senator who objected to my having a vote taken upon the resolution. I have no disposition to intrude this question at improper times or places. I gave notice that I should ask for a vote upon the resolution before a final vote upon the treaty. I had been assured by friends of the treaty that there would be no objection and that I could undoubtedly have a vote upon the resolution. Of course I did not have an opportunity to consult every Senator.

Mr. BACON. Will the Senator permit me to say to him that several days since I gave notice to the Senate that to-morrow morning, at the conclusion of the morning business, I would ask that the Senate would take up the joint resolution which I have introduced, S. R. 211, and that would conflict with the notice which the Senator now gives?

Mr. MASON. All right; I will withdraw my notice and make it for Monday morning.

I wish simply to say one thing. I desire to be fair. I want fair treatment, and I intend to have fair treatment if I can get it. There is a class of gentlemen upon this floor who are perfectly willing to vote for the treaty, but who want an opportunity to declare as to what the policy of the treaty-making power is. I am one of those gentlemen.

I had supposed that there could be no doubt that the friends of the treaty would give me an opportunity. I do not ask you to pass the resolution. Vote against it if you like, but give us an opportunity to vote upon the question whether that is or is not the intention of this body. Mine is not a joint resolution. It does not become a law or a part of the statutes. I am asking for a simple expression of the treaty-making power that you do or do not intend to govern those people perpetually by force and against their consent.

I will say to those gentlemen who are anxious to have the treaty passed that I have not asked for an amendment of the treaty, so far as my vote is concerned. I have not asked for a delay. Those of us who believe in the Declaration of Independence have been charged with making delay, when, as a matter of fact, those having the treaty in charge by unanimous consent have fixed the time for a vote. Not one of us objected to the fixing of the time.

I desire to say very respectfully that so far as I am personally concerned, and I speak only for myself, if the alleged friends of the treaty imagine that they can assist its passage by declining to give a vote on the simple proposition that I make, namely, that all the just powers of the governed are derived from the consent of the governed and that it is not our policy or intention to perpetually govern by force a neighboring people against their will—if gentlemen feel that they can assist their treaty by refusing us even a chance to express ourselves, then they must be their own judges; they must husband their own resources.

So far as I am concerned, I consider that I have not been fairly treated unless I can have a vote upon the resolution which I offered before the treaty came in here, when in my very opening sentence I gave notice that I should ask for a vote upon the resolution before a final vote upon the treaty.

I desire to say that I have no intention to make any threats. I have no intention to injure anyone. I intend to have a vote upon the resolution if I can. I consider it manifestly unfair to my resolution, which has been pending all this time. We have been charged with delaying the treaty, when we never have delayed it five minutes, but have stood ready to vote for it in twenty-four hours. I am ready to vote for it now. But I understood from conversation on the day that unanimous consent was given that my resolution was to be voted on. I was temporarily absent. I had not been ten minutes out of the Chamber. When I came in and was informed that it had been agreed to vote upon the treaty on the 6th of February, I was also informed that we were to have a vote upon the resolution offered by the Senator from Georgia or myself, or some other resolution that should declare the policy of the treaty-making branch of the Government. I think it is only fair that I should have a vote before the treaty is voted upon.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I rise to a question of order.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from New Hampshire will state his question of order.

Mr. GALLINGER. The Senator from Illinois speaks of his resolution as being the unfinished business. I desire to ask the Chair what is the status of the several resolutions? As I understand the rule, they go to the Calendar unless they are retained on the table by unanimous consent.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The resolution offered by the Senator from Illinois [Mr. MASON] is Table Calendar No. 19, resolution No. 445, and is upon the Calendar. The resolution offered by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] is not upon the Calendar. It is known as resolution No. 464, and it can be taken up at the request of the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. GALLINGER. By unanimous consent.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Or by a vote of the Senate.

Mr. GALLINGER. Or by a vote of the Senate.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The unfinished business of the Senate is Senate bill 1575.

Mr. HOAR. I understood that I had the unanimous consent of the Senate to call up the resolution at any time. I hope the Senator from New Hampshire will not make that point.

Mr. GALLINGER. I will not.

Mr. HOAR. Let the Senate do what it wants with the resolution when it is brought before it, but let it go over now in accordance with the understanding.

Mr. MONEY. Mr. President, will the Senator from New York kindly yield for one moment that I may make an announcement?

Mr. PLATT of New York. Certainly.

Mr. MONEY. I desire to give notice that on next Thursday, immediately after the routine morning business is completed, I desire to address the Senate upon the resolutions on the Calendar and on the table.

PENSION APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from California?

Mr. PLATT of New York. Certainly.

Mr. PERKINS. I simply desire to state that last evening unanimous consent was given that this morning, immediately after the consideration of the routine business, the Senate would proceed to the consideration of House bill 11157, which was then before the Senate upon its final passage, the Senators from Missouri and Maryland desiring to speak upon the pending question. I now simply desire that the Senator from New York may continue his remarks, and that that unanimous consent be continued until the close of his remarks.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there any objection to the request of the Senator from California for the continuation of the unanimous-consent agreement made last evening with reference to House bill 11157? The Chair hears no objection.

ACQUISITION OF TERRITORY.

Mr. MONEY. I have just learned that the Senator from Utah [Mr. RAWLINS] has given notice that he would occupy the hour after the routine business next Thursday. I do not know what time is unoccupied. I supposed I had gone beyond the request of anyone. I do not care exactly where I come in.

Several SENATORS. Next Friday.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Next Friday?

Mr. MONEY. On next Friday, then.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The notice given by the Senator from Mississippi is changed to Friday next.

POLICY REGARDING THE PHILIPPINE ISLANDS.

Mr. PLATT of New York. Mr. President, I suppose I may be permitted to enjoy the same latitude of discussion and the same liberty of expression which have distinguished the remarks of other Senators during this debate. It is scarcely possible to talk to the resolution of the Senator from Missouri without saying something concerning the treaty which is being considered in executive session. Indeed, the resolution may almost be looked upon as an amendment to the treaty. If the resolution were to pass and the treaty were then to be ratified, the resolution would be nothing less than a definition of what the treaty must be understood to mean. And in voting against the resolution, which will be my course when the occasion arrives, I desire to be understood as voting against any limitation upon the terms of the treaty.

There has never been absent from the floor of the Senate that class of intellect which has found in the Constitution its warrant for opposing new things. It has always been a superior class of intellect, without doubt earnest and sincere, but not always to be appreciated by ordinary minds that believe in finding a practical solution for practical questions as they arise one after another in the course of national experience, and that starts out in its consideration of all public questions with the assumption that the founders of our Government did not intend it to be anything less than a competent government. Nor is it new things only which are so resolutely opposed in the name of the fathers. It is old things, with new faces, as well. Here we have been for a whole century annexing territory—annexing with a club or with a caress, just as the necessities demanded—and yet Senators are discovering to one another the most acute distress over what they boldly describe as a "departure from time-honored traditions."

Mr. President, it was not the main purpose of the makers of the Constitution to point out a way in accordance with which the problems of government were to be solved. That purpose, no doubt, was in their minds to some extent, but to an extent which must have had its boundaries defined in their own experience, and even then they allowed it to appear in the Constitution with reluctance and obvious misgiving. Their main purpose was to devise a plan of government, and not to ordain policies; and where they seemed to be ordaining policies, where they departed from the main work of establishing the bodies which together should form the Government, and of distributing to each its particular functions, they were doing precisely what every other legislative assembly before their time and subsequently thereto has had to do—they were satisfying popular prejudices and looking forward to the day when their work would be passed upon by minds less trained than their own in the consideration of great principles and more subject than theirs to temporary and local prejudice.

I do not mean to suggest, Mr. President, that such legislation as does occur in the Constitution is any less binding upon us because it was put there as a concession to the sentiment of the hour, but I do affirm without hesitation that the inferences which we draw now from such legislation, limiting the power of the General Government and tending to render our Government less competent than other governments, need to be drawn carefully and need to be considered in the light of the whole scheme of Federal authority. It is true that we are a Government of limited powers, but the purpose of the limitation was simply to reserve to the people of the States such ample power as would enable them to determine their own affairs in their own way—such affairs, I mean, as were not also the affairs of the people of other States; and it was not the purpose of such limitation to hinder the Federal Government in providing as might seem best and wisest for the general welfare of the whole country.

It is surprising, Mr. President, how often it has been necessary to make this argument and to call attention to these distinctions, and yet I suppose the temptation is a natural one to make the phrase "a government of limited powers" mean a government empowered to do whatever each man wants done, but forbidden to do whatever each man opposes. That thought must have occurred, it seems to me, to every Senator who heard the proposition advanced here that we had the right under the Constitution to annex territory for the purpose of putting up guns to kill people with, but lacked the right of annexing it for the purpose of putting up schoolhouses and of doing the things that contribute to the happiness and prosperity of the people concerned.

The disorder now existing in the Philippine Islands, to which Senators who are opposing the treaty may well afford to consider how far they are contributing, the unwillingness of the armed natives to accept American authority, does not constitute, in my mind, the slightest ground on which to base a vote against the Paris agreement. On the contrary, it affords a new reason why our action should be the more prompt and unanimous. No Senator has had the hardihood to suggest that we shall now return these islands to the Spanish Government, and no other disposition of them than that is inconsistent with a vote to confirm the treaty. Imputations have been made here upon the purposes of those who advocate the assumption by the United States of Philippine sovereignty which can scarcely be genuine.

All this talk about forcing our Government upon an unwilling people, all this eloquent invocation of the spirit of the Declaration of Independence, is far and away from any real point that concerns the Senate in this discussion. No Senator can suppose that there exists an American statesman who approaches the consideration of the Philippine problem with any other than the most benevolent intentions concerning the Filipinos and their future. There are reasons why the natives of these islands, after their experience with Spanish misrule, should misunderstand the presence at Manila of an American army, but there is no reason why an American Senator should misunderstand it, and no justification of his course in misrepresenting it. He knows that there is no American in all this broad land who wishes any other fate to any single native of the Philippine Islands than his free enjoyment of a prosperous life.

He knows that close in the wake of American rule there would come to the Filipinos a liberty that they have never known and a far greater liberty than they could ever have under the arrogant rule of a native dictator. He knows, moreover, that it would be self-rule, the rule of the islanders to the full extent of their capacity in that direction, and that each successive American President would welcome the time when he could recommend new leases of self-government to an advancing and improving people. The Filipinos may not know these things yet, but every American Senator knows them, and puts himself and his country in a false position when, by attributing the spirit of conquest and aggression to those whose policy has rescued the Filipinos from Spain and would now rescue them from native tyrants, he encourages them to doubt the generous sentiment of our people.

I do not say that these considerations are absolutely conclusive of our right and duty to assume the direct and exclusive government of the Philippines, for we have our own interests to think about, but certainly they forbid the use on this floor of any argument which tends to imperil the safety of our troops at Manila or which adds one whit to the embarrassment of the Administration in the trying situation by which it is confronted.

Mr. President, I do not know, and I do not think anyone else can know, just what ought to be done with the Philippine Islands beyond this—that we ought, as instantly as possible, to complete the withdrawal of their sovereignty from the Kingdom of Spain, and that we ought ourselves to assume its obligations and prudently to discharge them until we have had full opportunity in our own councils to determine its best disposition. This is all that the treaty of Paris proposes or imposes. It is all that the Administration has at any time suggested. It is no more than a safe and conservative policy advises. It is no less than our public obligations require. It is a plain, clear, positive duty. It is one of those duties that are not to be got rid of by evasion nor even by denial. It would remain after you had rejected the treaty. It lies in the nature of the situation. Your army, your navy, and your flag are at Manila. You can add to their dangers if you will. But their duty abides, and the will of the nation must be done.

Mr. CHILTON. Mr. President, I wish to give notice—notice having been given by other Senators that they will occupy the intervening days—that on Saturday of next week I shall address the Senate after the close of the routine morning business on the joint resolution introduced by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST].

Mr. FAIRBANKS. Mr. President, on yesterday there was introduced into the RECORD a number of clippings purporting to have come from certain agricultural papers in opposition to annexation. No doubt other Senators as well as myself have from time to time received articles from some agricultural papers in opposition to this policy. It is perhaps proper that we should put into the RECORD some slight evidence bearing upon the manner in which adverse sentiment is sought to be created.

It will be observed that there is a systematic and subtle attempt to mislead the judgment and the opinion of the country. I am informed that the editor of an agricultural paper in Springfield, Mass., in December last sent to other agricultural papers Mr. Carnegie's letter to Secretary Wilson against annexation.

The editor requested the papers to publish the letter and to send a copy to every Senator and to every Representative, and to render the writer bill for all charges. Later he sent to the agricultural press a card, which I ask to be inserted as a part of my remarks.

The Secretary read as follows:

Please mail two marked copies of issue containing Mr. Carnegie's letter of December 2 to Secretary Wilson to Andrew Carnegie, 5 West Fifty-first street, New York; also send one marked copy to each of the following at Washington, D. C., in addition to one to each Senator and Representative at Washington, as already ordered, including the whole in one bill: The President, the Vice-President, Secretary Wilson, Secretary Hay, Secretary Gage, Secretary Alger, Secretary McKenna, Secretary Smith, Secretary Long, and Secretary Bliss.

Mr. FAIRBANKS. On December 31 the editor addressed another letter to the agricultural press. In the interest of historical accuracy, I send this letter to the desk to be read as a part of my remarks.

The Secretary read as follows:

SPRINGFIELD, MASS., December 31, 1898.

MY DEAR EDITOR: Will you please send me one or more clippings from your journal containing your views or anything you have printed regarding annexation, imperialism, militarism, etc. If you have not printed anything on the subject and propose to do so, an advance copy of the same would serve my purpose and avoid the delay of waiting for it to appear.

I am getting together the views of the entire agricultural press on this subject for presentation to Congress. If you make any charge for sending these slips, I will be happy to pay it, for I feel most strongly that annexation of the East and West Indies will disastrously affect the interest of our American farmers.

Please reply instantly by next mail, as time is short. Addressed stamped envelope inclosed.

Thanking you in advance, yours, very truly,

HERBERT MYRICK, President and Editor.

Mr. CHANDLER. I should like to ask upon what bill or resolution the Senator from Indiana [Mr. FAIRBANKS] was speaking, or was it a personal explanation?

Mr. FAIRBANKS. It was pertinent to the joint resolution introduced by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST].

Mr. CHANDLER. Mr. President, speaking to the same joint resolution, I want to ask the Senator from Indiana to say whether he objects to the payment of the necessary and legitimate expenses of having the views of the agriculturists of this country presented in the form of petitions to Congress? The Senator certainly had some object in the remarks he made. He either approves or he censures the proceedings which are being taken to present such views, under the sacred right of petition, to Congress.

Now, I want to know whether he objects to the method which has been adopted? There seems to have been a payment of money made for the expenses of this movement. I did not learn whether or not it appeared who paid the money. I should like to have the Senator state, if the documents which he presented show the fact, who is paying the bills for the proper presentation of the views of the farmers of the country to Congress, and whether the Senator from Indiana objects to it?

Mr. FAIRBANKS. Mr. President, the Senator from Indiana simply submitted the information as supplemental to that which was furnished by the distinguished junior Senator from Illinois [Mr. MASON] yesterday.

It would seem from what has been said that the clippings which have been procured for influencing Congress have been procured at somebody's expense; that Mr. Carnegie's letter has also been very systematically distributed through some portion of the agricultural press. But who paid the bills, if any there were, I do not know, nor do I undertake to say.

I have neither commendation nor criticism to offer. I have submitted for the information of the Senate the facts put in my hands, and it is for the Senator to put his own construction upon them.

Mr. CHANDLER. It seems to me we have the right to know the views the Senator from Indiana entertains when he puts in these documents. They are long and somewhat obscure, and they are put in for a purpose; otherwise the Senator would not have them put in the RECORD. Now, does the Senator undertake to either criticise or condemn the agriculturists of the country or Mr. Andrew Carnegie for paying the expenses of the agricultural press of the country in making the representations they choose to make to the Senate in reference to the policy of expansion?

Mr. HOAR. Mr. President, I have but a word to say. What has appeared in the Senate, as I understand it, is exactly this: That the editor of an agricultural paper, much interested in resisting the policy of contracting the Republic and expanding the domain of empire and irresponsible and despotic government in this world, and being of opinion that the farmers of this country, both as American citizens and as engaged in the great employment of agriculture, are to be great sufferers thereby, has gathered for the information of the public and the Senate the opinion of the agricultural press on that subject for the purpose of submitting it to us and to the people. If there could be a more absolutely harmless and a more absolutely desirable thing to do, I can not conceive of it.

Why, Mr. President, I suppose when my honorable friend from Indiana [Mr. FAIRBANKS] makes a speech which he thinks will instruct his constituents or be interesting to them, he has it printed at his own cost, and it is dispersed to the people at the cost of the nation through the mails, free; and in the case of so eminent a Senator as the Senator from Indiana, other Senators subscribe for and send copies of his arguments to their constituents. Is there any criticism to be made of an American citizen, deeply interested and concerned by a great danger to the Republic and to liberty and to honesty, as he conceives it, gathering from the agricultural press, which represents to a large extent the farming opinion of this country, their opinions and sending them to us? Is there any objection to a person who wishes to disseminate the views which he entertains, sending those views to the papers and having them paid for as advertisements or otherwise, as a mode of circulating, instead of printing pamphlets? I can not conceive of any just criticism.

I should welcome for my own instruction a corresponding action on the part of the friends of this policy, which I regard as so dangerous and destructive to the country, and indeed there are many of them who are doing the same thing. I have received abundant clippings from newspapers all over the country favoring this expansion business. Somebody sends them to me. I do not understand that the Senator from Indiana has made any objection to that thing being done on that side of the question. They are not infrequently accompanied with not only expressions of the opinion of the editor as to the policy to be pursued, but they very clearly state the opinion of the editor as to the character of any humble individual who may happen to differ from him. I do not object. I think it is a good plan for a man to have the mirror held up to his nature in that way. It does not hurt anybody.

Mr. CHANDLER. May I ask the Senator whether he knows of any man with money, more or less, who is engaged in the business of collecting newspaper expressions, securing their publication, and then collecting them on what is called the expansion side of the question, to which the Senator is opposed?

Mr. HOAR. I suppose the men who collect newspaper clippings, send them to me, and pay postage have money, more or less, to use the Senator's phrase, or they would not do it. It can not be done for nothing. I do not remember particularly who the persons are, but I have the names of some of them.

Mr. CHANDLER. The Senator, I think, meant to convey the impression that there was a systematic attempt to do it, like that which the Senator from Indiana has shown exists upon the other side.

Mr. HOAR. I did not mean to convey an impression, if the Senator will pardon me. I meant to state, as clearly and distinctly as I knew how, a fact.

Mr. CHANDLER. Does the Senator say that there is a systematic gathering in of petitions and newspaper extracts to present to Congress, carried on and paid for by money, in favor of the views which the Senator from Massachusetts is opposing?

Mr. HOAR. I do not know what the Senator means by a "systematic gathering in." That is a very vague and indefinite phrase. I stated with absolute distinctness the fact, and it is a thing which takes place in regard to every important subject of political controversy in this country. When we have a tariff pending, somebody takes the pains to gather and make known to Senators the opinions of the press about questions relating to protection or free trade.

I wish to repeat, that if any gentleman, rich or poor, on either side of this question, has spent his money to gather arguments on either side which are contained in the public press, and to present them to us for our information, he has, in my judgment, and I suppose in the judgment of the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. CHANDLER], done a beneficial and laudable thing, on whichever side of the question he does it. Who does not want to know, if there is a great public question up, what the Concord Monitor thinks? [Laughter.] Why, Mr. President, if we are to have wisdom, we must go to the sources of wisdom; and if my honorable friend from New Hampshire can contribute either by pen or voice to any public discussion interesting the people or interesting the Senate, his contributions are always welcome and instructive, certainly to me for one, and I think to his associates in general. If that be true of him, it is true in many cases, of course in a less degree, but still true of the press throughout the country.

Mr. MASON. Mr. President——

Mr. CARTER. Before the Senator from Massachusetts resumes his seat, with his permission I should like to ask him a question.

Mr. HOAR. I shall be glad to answer any question which the Senator puts, if I can.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Illinois yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. MASON. Yes, sir.

Mr. CARTER. I agree with the Senator from Massachusetts that his public-spirited constituent has a perfect right to pay for the insertion of Mr. Carnegie's letter in the agricultural papers throughout the country. I desire to know, however, whether he discerns any moral turpitude in the effort manifested through this correspondence of his constituent to purchase editorial expressions favorable to the policy outlined in that letter?

Mr. HOAR. I have not seen or heard any such suggestion. If the Senator wishes to ask me the abstract question whether, in my judgment, it is an act of moral turpitude to purchase of an editor his opinion, which otherwise would not be given on that side, by a payment of money directly or indirectly, I suppose there could be but one answer to such a question as that. It is moral turpitude.

Mr. MASON. I desire to say——

Mr. TILLMAN. Will the Senator from Illinois allow me?

Mr. MASON. Yesterday I had an order from the Senate for publishing certain papers in the RECORD, to which I suppose this discussion is directed. I examined the matter——

Mr. TILLMAN. Will the Senator allow me for a moment?

Mr. MASON. I beg your pardon. I will be through in a minute, but I will yield to the Senator if he wishes to ask a question.

Mr. TILLMAN. I wish to ask a question relating to the subject these Senators have been discussing.

Mr. MASON. You can ask the question. I am perfectly willing to yield to the Senator for that purpose.

Mr. TILLMAN. I wish to ask the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. CHANDLER] and the Senator from Indiana [Mr. FAIRBANKS], who, I am sure, are both well posted on the subject, as to the sources of the various memorials and the infinite amount of information or misinformation which have come to this body in regard to the anti-scalping bill, how that originated, and whether anybody paid for that?

Mr. FAIRBANKS. Mr. President, answering for myself, I have to say that I have no knowledge of any kind or character upon the subject.

Mr. CHANDLER. Mr. President, answering for myself, I will say that when the anti-scalping bill comes up for consideration I small exhibit, with the help of the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN], in full the methods that were used to produce the public opinion proceeding from the four and a half million people, as stated by the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. SEWELL], in behalf of that bill.

Mr. MASON. Mr. President, I desire to say in this connection, because the discussion refers to the insertion in the RECORD yesterday of the clippings from agricultural papers which I presented, that they were sent to me, but with no request that they be printed. It was my own idea to give to my colleagues the benefit of the opinion of the agricultural newspapers of the country. There is nothing, so far as I have been able to find, except the statement made by the Senator from Indiana [Mr. FAIRBANKS], that these editorials were paid matter. I see nothing that would indicate that the editors of the great agricultural papers of the country have been paid to give expressions editorially; and I think the statement is exceedingly unfortunate, to say the least, for there is nothing so far which has been inserted in the RECORD to indicate that these great newspapers have been paid so much a line for editorial expressions or editorial comments. I believe that is not in the range of possibility.

I recognize among the papers which I had inserted in the RECORD the Maine Farmer, published at Augusta; the New Hampshire Mirror and Farmer, of Manchester, N. H., and the Rural New Yorker. The article from that paper, however, is not, I believe, an editorial, but an alleged poem written after the old New England style, which brought to my mind information for which I and the Senate ought to be thankful.

Mr. HOAR. I desire to suggest to my honorable friend if it is a poem in the old New England style he has no right to speak of it in that way.

Mr. MASON. I said it was "an alleged poem," but it gives some information which I think some of these gentlemen ought to have. I did not have that information before. It begins in this way:

> What's this I hear? Australia has the job of selling sheep
> To feed our Yankee boys in blue? That makes my dander creep!

I wonder if all the gentlemen who are so crazy—I do not mean absolutely insane, but who are partially demented upon this question—realize the fact that we are feeding our own Army from another country? If the agricultural papers have done nothing else, they have at least called attention to the fact that when we annex great territories, and, as is proposed, grow rich by governing people without their consent, after we have thoroughly asserted the doctrine of our religion at the point of the gun, and after having thoroughly subdued them, we are to feed our standing armies by the products of the farms of Australia.

I now simply wish to make this suggestion. I offered these clippings in good faith. I do not believe the agricultural editors of this country were born with their hands behind them; I do not believe they have changed their editorial opinions at so much a line; I do not believe there is money enough in this country to make them do that, and I think it is exceedingly unfortunate that the Senator from Indiana should say that he understands these editorials were inserted as paid matter. I have inserted them in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD in order to afford an opportunity for all to see and know what the farmers think about this question.

I am a protectionist, and I have for a long time realized as a protectionist that we are building up factories in this country and furnishing to the farmers a home market; but it is not always and at all times and places equal to the burden upon the farmers. I have sought to find, with the help of the leaders of my party, some way to counterbalance that disadvantage, if possible, and now the agriculturists of this country, speaking through their newspapers, say to us: "You do not intend to use the product of our farms, though you are going to violate your Constitution and the Declaration of Independence. You are going to subdue those people; you are going to make them wear shirts whether they want shirts or not, in order to increase the price of calico in New England."

After having done that, and while your army is there subduing those people and teaching them the beauties of Christian civilization with guns and forts, the agricultural papers call attention to the fact that you do not even increase the demand for the produce of the farm, that the game is not worth the powder, and that you are spending money and spending men to carry out your desire of governing people without their consent, adding the tinsel and gewgaws of royalty to put upon the leaders of Tammany Hall or some other distinguished statesmen who may become the governors of those islands and govern them without their consent. It has been driven into the minds of the people of this country that we are about to do that. It is said we have had a great trust thrust upon us; that, like the good Samaritan, we have to give the man who has fallen by the wayside a dose of our medicine until he should draw on us a gun from his pocket and say, "Hands off!" telling us as good Samaritans we can increase our trade and commerce to furnish a market for our goods, and yet by the very statement of these people who represent the agriculturists of this country you show by your own conduct that you are feeding an American army with meat and vegetables from Australia.

PENSION APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. PERKINS. In accordance with the unanimous consent which has already been granted, I ask the Senate to proceed to the consideration of the bill (H. R. 11157) making appropriations for invalid and other pensions of the United States for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1900, and for other purposes.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is, Shall the bill pass?

Mr. COCKRELL. Mr. President, the Senator from Maryland [Mr. GORMAN], who will be here in a moment, having been called out of the Chamber for a few minutes, desires to make some remarks upon the bill. He was not present yesterday evening when the bill was about to be passed. It is now beyond amendment, as I understand the Chair. It may be that when the Senator from Maryland addresses the Senate he will desire to offer some amendments to the bill. I am not certain of that. In the event that he does, I trust the Senator from California in charge of the bill will kindly consent that a reconsideration of the vote may be had.

Mr. President, in this bill there is no attempt to change existing laws in regard to the persons entitled to pensions or the rates of compensation. The amendment which was offered by the junior Senator from Mississippi [Mr. SULLIVAN] yesterday evening was a very important amendment, and one that should certainly receive full and favorable consideration at the hands of the Committee on Pensions. The Senator in charge of the bill having made the point of order that the amendment proposed general legislation upon an appropriation bill, and was not, therefore, in order, the Chair very promptly and properly sustained the point. It was clearly not admissible when the point of order was made. But it is a question which should be fully considered by the Committee on Appropriations, and I trust that they will consider the question and report to the Senate.

The suggestions I made yesterday evening were because I believed the amendment as it was at first worded might tend to increase the number of persons who were entitled to pensions as widows. But that was very promptly and properly removed by the substitute offered by the Senator from Mississippi.

Mr. VEST. I should like to ask my colleague a question.

Mr. COCKRELL. Certainly.

Mr. VEST. I was called out of the Senate last evening when an amendment was pending offered by some Senator, substantially the same as the bill which the Senate passed last session in regard to widows. Was a point of order raised against that?

Mr. COCKRELL. A point of order was raised against the amendment, and the Chair excluded it.

Mr. GALLINGER. It was ruled out on a point of order.

Mr. COCKRELL. It was ruled out on a point of order. I trust that the Committee on Pensions will not slack their energies in regard to the question of widows involved in an amendment which was also offered to this bill and ruled out on a point of order. I think those two questions should be fully considered by the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. GORMAN. Mr. President, the pending pension appropriation bill contains appropriations amounting to $145,233,880, which is a very large sum of money, and is, as I understand it, in conformity with the estimates of the Department. I should like to ask the Senator from California who is in charge of the bill if in his judgment after examination—a careful one, such as I am quite certain he has given to it—he believes that $145,000,000 is a sufficient amount to pay the pensions that will accrue during the coming fiscal year, or are we to have, as we have had frequently heretofore, a large deficiency on this item, to come in later?

Before the Senator from California answers the question, I will state, in order that he may be in possession of all the facts I have, that I find from the Commissioner's report that while the bill conforms to his estimate, there are now in the office to be adjusted original claims of 200,000 living Union soldiers who have not at any time heretofore had a pension granted. With the facilities for expediting these claims through the Department I should like to ask whether or not the new additions that will be made in the year will not increase the payments to be made, so that we will have a deficiency of several million dollars?

In addition to that the Commissioner very frankly states that this estimate does not make provision for the claims growing out of the war with Spain which will be filed by soldiers who served in that war. I can understand perfectly that it would be impossible at this early day for the Commissioner to form any sort of an accurate estimate as to how many applicants for pensions there will be because of service in Cuba and Porto Rico and Manila. We should consider the immense amount of sickness which has been caused by the transfer of our people from this northern climate to the Tropics. It is said that 17 per cent of them have been and are now affected by diseases which in all probability will entitle them, or a large part of them, to pensions under the general law. So this measure which we are passing here as a mere matter of form, embracing within its fold $148,000,000, going through as a matter of course, provides for only those now on the rolls who served in the Union Army from 1861 to 1865, or in the Mexican war, and the small number of pensions growing out of the war of 1812.

In addition to that we have also appropriated, not in this bill, but in other bills—and the amount may be increased during the next fiscal year and probably it will be—the sum of $2,841,021 for National Homes and $825,000 for State Homes, which the States maintain, but we aid to that extent, which will make the expenditure for pensions and Soldiers' Homes for the next fiscal year aggregate $152,431,992. To that we must add, as I have said, whatever comes from the present war on account of all the men who have suffered and who are disabled because of diseases contracted in Cuba, Porto Rico, and Manila. We must provide also for the great number of troops that the War Department has assigned to those three places. The best testimony I have been able to gather, commencing with the General in Command of the Army and the Adjutant-General of the Army, is that if 50,000 men are maintained in Cuba for six months one-half of them will be brought home disabled, a portion of them permanently disabled, because of disease contracted in the service.

Mr. HALE. Will the Senator from Maryland allow me to make a suggestion?

Mr. GORMAN. Certainly.

Mr. HALE. I think the crippling and destruction of our troops in Cuba and Manila will be far beyond what the Senator states. In conversation only a few days ago with a distinguished officer connected with our forces in Cuba, who is now here, he stated that if the troops were not withdrawn from there before July or August, substantially the entire army would be down with sickness and would have to be ordered home, and would be broken men. So the Senator has not stated his case too strongly.

Mr. GORMAN. I am very much indebted to the Senator from Maine for the information.

Mr. HOAR. Will the Senator from Maryland allow me to make a suggestion in this connection? Has the Senator read the official English reports of the diseases of the English army in the tropical countries? I have received within a day or two the English Parliamentary reports, and I have also seen, although not the official ones, the French reports. The English reports show that in India and in some other of her tropical colonies the number of soldiers committed to her hospitals annually, in addition to those who are sick in their tents, considerably exceeds the entire number of soldiers. Of course where, in some instances, a man is committed once and discharged and then committed again, he is counted twice. I ask the Senator if he has examined those English reports?

Mr. GORMAN. In answer to the Senator from Massachusetts, I will say that my attention has been called to the statements, but I have not been able to give them the thorough and complete examination which I hope to give to them a little later on.

Mr. GALLINGER. I beg the Senator's pardon. With the Senator's permission——

Mr. GORMAN. I will yield with great pleasure if the Senator will permit me to complete the sentence.

Mr. GALLINGER. Certainly.

Mr. GORMAN. But I have gone into the matter fully enough to satisfy me that with the present force which we have, distributed as they are—50,000 in Cuba, 20,000 in Manila, 6,000 in Porto Rico, and the balance of our troops that we are to keep upon the Southern border of our own country—if they are retained until September next, it will unquestionably swell the rolls of proper applicants for pensions at least 50,000 beyond the 200,000 now pending. Now I will listen with pleasure to the Senator from New Hampshire.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I regret that the senior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] has left the Chamber. I meant to propound the inquiry to him, inasmuch as I have had occasion to look over those English reports, as well as the French reports, whether a very large percentage of the diseases that the English and French soldiers are suffering from are not preventable diseases; and while I do not intend to minimize the importance of the statement——

Mr. SPOONER. They are preventable.

Mr. GALLINGER. Yes, as is suggested to me by the Senator from Wisconsin, I ought to have made the statement a little stronger and said they are preventable. While I do not undertake to minimize the importance of the statement made by the Senator from Maryland or the Senator from Massachusetts, yet it is well enough for us to understand that a false impression goes out when it is said that every soldier in the English army has had hospital experience.

Mr. GORMAN. Mr. President, I do not desire to be understood by any Senator as being antagonistic to the system, and I am sure no Senator, in view of the course I have always pursued in granting pensions to the men who have served in the Army and Navy, having always voted for liberal pensions to every man who has been disabled, will so understand me, but on more than one occasion I have felt it to be my duty to call the attention of the Senate, so far as I could, and that of the country, to the enormous amount we are paying on account of pensions. I prepared, through experts of my own selection, when the last general pension bill was passed, a statement showing that the amount of pensions under the law of 1890 would exceed $160,000,000 per annum.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. I rise to a question of order. It is utterly impossible to hear what is going on in the Senate.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senate will be in order.

Mr. GORMAN. I am aware that this is a very dry subject and not of very much importance, as there are only a hundred and fifty or a hundred and sixty or a hundred and seventy million dollars of the people's money involved; but the country after a while will probably get hold of these figures, and those who pay the taxes, I say to my friend, the Senator from Arkansas, will probably listen and digest the matter to some extent.

Mr. President, the Senator from Massachusetts has called my attention to the reports as to the operation of the English army in southern climates, showing the immense number who are affected in those climates. I read two short extracts:

SICK RATE IN THE BRITISH ARMY IN INDIA.

[Medical Department Report for 1896, Parliamentary Blue Book.]

In computing the probable rate of sickness and disability among American troops in tropical countries, especially in the Philippine Islands, it must be kept in mind that the latter are close to the equator, latitude 4.40° to 20° north, while India extends from 8° to 35° north. India is, as a rule, dry and possesses numerous health stations or cantonments on the hills, while the climate of the Philippines is damp and malarious. Even in comparing the hot and malarious parts of India with the Philippines, it must be kept in mind that English troops are all regulars, that the number at each station is relatively small, and that at each station all the precautions known to modern sanitary science are taken in order to keep the sick rate low. In the Philippines none of these precautions have been taken, no well-prepared stations exist, sanitary science is unknown, and our troops must be mostly volunteers, under the direction, mainly, of inexperienced and ill-prepared line officers. With these facts in mind, the following figures may give warning:

General average of India, number of warrant officers, noncommissioned officers, and men in service, 1896	70,484
Admission to hospitals	97,738
Admissions per 1,000	1,386.7
Average sick time, each soldier, days	34.35
Number constantly sick	93.85

The above averages cover the so-called health stations as well as the plains.

For a true comparison with the Philippine Islands the condition of the troops on the plains must be taken, although the stations are, as a rule, dry, and are much farther north.

* * * * * * *

It may be safely assumed that the sick rate in the Philippines will in some measure correspond to the stations on the plains in India, adding whatever may be due to the humid climate, the lack of hospitals, etc., and the ignorance of line officers. The sick rate in the hill stations will correspond to what may be expected in Cuba and Porto Rico in the country districts, while the cities will for the present be worse than Bombay, Madras, Calcutta, etc., where about the average of India is found, 1,400 admissions to hospital in each 1,000 and a fraction less than 10 per cent constantly sick. Some of the regiments suffer more than others; apparently those most recently recruited. The figures of the proportion constantly in hospital are suggestive:

Command.	Strength.	Constantly sick.
First Royal Fusiliers	931	118.61
Second Royal Irish	955	136.35
First Royal Welsh	877	140.19
Second Welsh	921	132.21

Another fact will be observed, namely, the increasing tendency to venereal disease of the most malignant type, which develops rapidly when the hopeless conditions of military service in the Tropics become apparent.

No precaution, notwithstanding the splendid skill shown by the head of the Medical Department of our Army, which is so much commended and admired by all those who served in Cuba and Porto Rico during the last year, will prevent our soldiers from contracting the diseases which the English soldiers contract in southern climates.

Just here I may say that if the authorities of this Government, warned by the experience of other nations which have attempted to keep their men in the Tropics, will change the rule, if we are to hold possession, and organize this force so as to be officered by our men, but composed of natives who can endure the climate, we would not have in either Hall of Congress constant appeals and demands for the increase of the Regular Army to 100,000 men to be enlisted from our own people.

But aside from that, coming back to the matter of pensions, this country ought to know that the policy which we are now pursuing—the policy, so far as I know it and as the public knows it, of the President and the Administration, which is being attempted to be forced through Congress—means that in three years from this date the pension roll alone will amount to $165,000,000 per annum. If you add to it the cost of maintaining the enlarged Army at the rate of a thousand dollars a man, in the year 1900 the American Republic will spend more for its soldiers who have served it heretofore and for those who are serving it now and who will be serving it then, if the Army is increased to 100,000, than any other nation on the face of the earth. That is the condition which the American people will have to face, and they ought to know now in advance what the situation will be if the schemes, if I may so call them, or the projects that are being forced upon us are carried out.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. Mr. President, I have no desire to make a speech on this occasion, but I have a pamphlet in my hand, in two parts—"I. The cost of a national crime; II. The hell of war and its penalties"—written by Edward Atkinson, of Brookline, Mass. It is full of statistics and valuable information bearing on this point, and I ask unanimous consent that it may be inserted in the RECORD, as I do not care to detain the Senate by reading it.

Mr. LODGE. Why should those pamphlets be inserted in the RECORD?

Mr. ALLISON. Let them be printed as a document.

Mr. TELLER. Print them as a document.

Mr. GALLINGER. That would be the better way.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. I should like to have the matter printed in the RECORD.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. Then no one will ever see it.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. If persons do not want to read it, they need not do so, but I should like to have it printed in the RECORD and as a document also.

Mr. TELLER. Oh, no. Print it as a document.

Mr. TILLMAN. The Senator from Arkansas can get it in the RECORD by reading it.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. Certainly; and I propose to do it, if it can not be printed otherwise. Mr. President, is there objection to printing it in the RECORD?

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. I think we all ought to object to the request made by the Senator from Arkansas to print in the RECORD a particular document that somebody outside of Congress has written. There are a dozen documents on this subject which are just as important as the one presented by the Senator from Arkansas; we can not print them all in the RECORD, and I think the better way is not to print any of them.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. There is no objection to matters of this kind, if they state the truth, which are prepared by intelligent citizens of the United States who have gone to the trouble to compile the statistics, being seen and read and known by the people of the United States. If they are not true they can be contradicted by the gentlemen who know what is the truth in the matter. I do not propose to detain the Senate any further, Mr. President, and as I should like to have this go to the American public, I shall trespass on the time of the Senate far enough to read it.

Mr. SPOONER. I hope the Senator will withdraw his objection. It will go into the RECORD. It is within the power of any Senator, according to the custom of the Senate, no matter if all other Senators object, to incorporate a paper in the RECORD by reading it, and the Senator from Arkansas ought not to be put to that trouble. He will take it. We may need a modification of our rules, but as the rule stands it is absolutely idle to object.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair recognizes the Senator from Massachusetts, with the permission of the Senator from Arkansas.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. Certainly.

Mr. LODGE. Will the Senator from Arkansas allow me to say one word, simply in the capacity of chairman of the Committee on Printing? I have no objection to this pamphlet going into the RECORD any more than anything else, but if one pamphlet is put in, why not another? We are deluged every day with pamphlets on one side or the other, and of equal merit.

If we are going to open the RECORD to all the pamphlets that are written on every public question, it will swell the cost of printing enormously. There is no use in my making an objection, because the Senator from Arkansas can read the pamphlet and thus put it in, and I have no desire by any objection to subject him to that annoyance; but I merely wish to say, as the printing comes under my supervision to a certain extent, that I think we are entering on a field of great expenditure by the practice of printing long pamphlets, books even, in the RECORD, so that they may be sent through the mails free. If this custom is kept up there is nothing to prevent the loading of the RECORD with books and loading the mail in consequence with an immense amount of matter. I shall make no objection, because I do not desire to make the Senator from Arkansas read the pamphlet.

Mr. SPOONER. Will the Senator allow me a moment?

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. Certainly.

Mr. SPOONER. I do not know of anyone more accurate in speech than the Senator from Massachusetts, but when he says we are entering upon a practice which will be of great expense to the Government he ought to say that we long ago entered upon it.

Mr. LODGE. I admit that we long ago entered upon it, and I think it is an extremely bad practice.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. It has been a practice without variation.

Mr. SPOONER. It has been going on without modification.

Mr. LODGE. It is a bad practice and it ought to be stopped. It ought not to be any longer allowed, in my judgment.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. I object to its being stopped at this particular juncture. I ask unanimous consent for the printing of the matter in the RECORD.

Mr. SPOONER. Does the Senator from Massachusetts withdraw his objection?

Mr. LODGE. I make no objection. It is useless.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to printing in the RECORD the papers referred to? The Chair hears none, and the order is made.

Mr. HOAR. Will the Senator from Arkansas pardon me a moment?

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. Certainly.

Mr. HOAR. I should like to ask unanimous consent (I am sure no Senator will object) to printing as a document two English reports of the medical department of the army. They are very brief, being almost entirely statistical. There are only three or four pages, if I recollect aright, of each, and I am sure, whatever view a Senator may take of this question, he will like to have these reports before him. If they should be quoted, as, if I have occasion to speak again hereafter, I shall probably quote them, I think Senators who disagree with me will think there may be something in them which ought to modify the conclusions I have derived from them, and justice to them would seem to require that these articles should be printed as a document. I do not ask that they be printed in the RECORD.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. At the suggestion of a number of Senators, I will suggest that the papers I have presented be printed as a document and not be printed in the RECORD.

Mr. GALLINGER. That is right.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senate has heard both the request made by the Senator from Massachusetts and that made by the Senator from Arkansas to print as a document the matter referred to by each of the Senators. Is there any objection? The Chair hears none, and the order is made.

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. President, I desire to say but one word in reply to the distinguished Senator from Maryland [Mr. GORMAN]. Your committee, as I stated yesterday, have recommended that no appropriations be made except for those pensions which are provided for by law, and in arriving at the amount required they necessarily must consult the Chief of the Bureau of Pensions, which they did. There was a careful examination of his report. There was also an examination by the committee of the House of Representatives and his statement was there taken down. The estimate which he has given, which is embraced in this bill, is $4,000,000 more than was appropriated last year. It was his judgment and opinion, sustained by his assistants in the Bureau, that this sum would be ample to pay the pensions for 1900.

When asked in relation to the probable increase of pensions by reason of our recent war with Spain, he replied that he had considered the subject; that it was entirely problematical of course; and he had estimated $150,000,000; but upon reflection and in view of the war closing much sooner than was anticipated he thought the sum estimated would be ample. The pensions that we are paying as a result of the war of 1812 have nearly passed away. In the case of those prior to 1861, the Indian wars, nature has paid the pensions. The soldiers of those wars have gone to "that bourne from whence no traveler returns." A generation has passed away—thirty-three years—since our civil war. By death and by expiration of the minority period of orphans and other causes some 47,000 were dropped last year from the pension rolls.

After considering all the conditions that exist, your committee have not deemed it wise or expedient to raise the amount or recommend that a larger sum be appropriated than that which was recommended by the Commissioner of Pensions and which met the approval of the Secretary of the Interior.

Mr. GORMAN. Will the Senator from California permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. PERKINS. Certainly.

Mr. GORMAN. Do I understand the Senator to say that the one hundred and forty-odd million dollars estimated will be increased on account of the soldiers who served in the war with Spain?

Mr. PERKINS. The Commissioner of Pensions, in his examination before the House committee, was asked the following question:

What do you estimate the claims growing out of the Spanish war will amount to?

He replied:

We have no data on which to base an estimate. Up to the 30th of November there have been only 1,783 claims filed on account of the Spanish war, and many of those were cases of widows. There have been 901 invalids—men wounded and badly disabled in various ways—and some of these were from the District of Columbia.

After passing further on, the chairman said:

If we should appropriate $144,000,000 it would probably cover all.

That is, all his estimates and these cases.

Mr. EVANS. I think it would. I made my estimate before peace was declared.

The CHAIRMAN. If we should provide $140,000,000, would the deficiency be more than it has been for the fiscal years 1898 and 1899?

Mr. EVANS. I estimated for $8,000,000 deficiency for 1898, but we did not use it all. We used $4,651,000 more than the appropriation of $140,000,000—in all, $144,651,000, and that left $730,000 in vouchers in the hands of agents for 1898.

He had considered in his estimate, as I understand it, that these claims would be made and intended that his estimate should cover them. Yet he is without data; the matter is purely speculative.

While I fully appreciate the force of the remarks of the Senator from Maryland that there will be undoubtedly large claims resulting from the war, and our soldiers who are now in the tropical climates will be disabled by disease or suffering from wounds will become pensioners, yet it seems to me when these claims shall have been presented to us it will be time enough for us to consider them. If we go outside of the estimates of the different bureaus for appropriations, where are we to draw the line? In every Department of the Government—the Interior Department, the War Department, the Navy Department, and so on, as the case may be—we go to the heads of the respective Departments, and their estimates are finally approved by the Secretary of the Treasury.

It is upon their recommendations that we act. After we have reviewed them and considered them we come to the Senate, giving the result of our investigations as to whether we believe the estimate is too much or too little. So with this bill we believe it wise for us to take the recommendation of the Chief of the Bureau of Pensions, which has been approved by the Secretary of the Interior. If the amount required exceeds the appropriation, we must meet it by a deficiency bill when the proper time comes.

Mr. GORMAN. Mr. President, I did not quite understand my friend from California, and I will detain the Senate but a few moments, for I want the bill to pass. I understand from the report of the Commissioner of Pensions and his estimates that not one dollar has been estimated or is appropriated in this bill on account of the war with Spain. That is his distinct statement, as I understand his report. Therefore, the pensions arising from the late war with Spain are to be covered by a deficiency appropriation at the next session, if I understand his report correctly. I ask the Senator from California if it is not true that no provision whatever has been made in this appropriation bill for those pensions?

I have only one other word to say, and I will ask the Senator when he gets an opportunity to look at it. The Senator speaks about time having diminished the pension roll. We are, of course, eighty-five years from the war of 1814 and thirty-odd years from the civil war; yet I want to call the Senator's attention to what the Commissioner of Pensions says on page 4 of his last report. He says:

At the close of the year June 30, 1898, the annual value of the roll—

That is, the payment on account of pensions—was $130,968,465. June 30, 1897, the annual value of the roll was $129,795,428, showing an increase of $1,173,037.

And then the Commissioner of Pensions adds:

So that the roll is not only increasing in numbers, but in values.

This was on all the wars preceding the Spanish war.

It is believed that the roll will increase from the war of the rebellion, as there are probably 200,000 ex-Union soldiers living who have never had pension.

I venture the assertion to-day that the amount of one hundred and forty-odd million dollars you are appropriating to-day—$152,000 including the Soldiers' Homes—will not be sufficient to pay the soldiers who served in the Army prior to the declaration of the war with Spain, and that when Congress comes to deal with this question within a year you will not only have a deficiency on account of the soldiers of prior wars, but you must make provision for the 1,783 claims already filed on account of the Spanish war, and for many more when you reach that period. I will not detain the Senate further.

Mr. PERKINS. The hour of 2 o'clock having nearly arrived, I simply want to say one word in reply to my friend from Maryland. During my early experience in the Senate upon the committee, when my distinguished friend from Maryland had charge of this and other bills, I can not call to my mind a single instance where he recommended the appropriation of a larger sum than was approved by the Chief of the Pension Bureau or the Secretary of the Interior. Following that example, I am sure he will know that I have been a faithful student so far as imitating him in this respect. Therefore, I hope that the bill will pass as now presented to the Senate.

Mr. GORMAN. I am not complaining of the Senator. I only wanted to bring out the facts as they appear from the Department.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I presume we may have a few additional minutes. I want to make a very brief observation simply on this bill, and I will make it so brief that no fault will be found.

Mr. SPOONER. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. GALLINGER. Certainly.

Mr. SPOONER. Is it true, as stated by the Senator from Maryland, that no estimate is made in the bill by the Commissioner of Pensions for pensions on account of the Spanish-American war?

Mr. ALLISON. It is for all pensions, no matter what war.

Mr. SPOONER. Does it cover applications for pensions on account of the Spanish-American war?

Mr. ALLISON. Certainly.

Mr. HALE. It covers all pension laws.

Mr. PERKINS. All pension laws.

Mr. GALLINGER. I have not examined the testimony given by the Commissioner of Pensions before the House committee, but my impression is that he there said he expected this bill as framed would cover the entire pension appropriation for the next fiscal year; but it is to be remembered, and it is idle to undertake to cover facts in this matter, that the pension appropriation for the war with Spain will increase from year to year for several years to come.

Mr. SPOONER. What I want to get at is whether there is no law under which a soldier who received a pensionable disability, whether from wounds in battle, disease, or whatever it might have been, is entitled to a pension?

Mr. GALLINGER. Certainly; and the pensions are being allowed at the Pension Bureau.

Mr. PERKINS. They are being allowed every day.

Mr. GALLINGER. Every day.

Mr. SPOONER. And those are covered by this estimate?

Mr. GALLINGER. Beyond question; that is the expectation of the Commissioner of Pensions.

Mr. COCKRELL. In other words, as I understand it, if the Senator will permit me to make a suggestion, pensions are granted to the soldiers in the Spanish war just as to the soldiers of the war of the rebellion.

Mr. GALLINGER. Precisely.

Mr. COCKRELL. And they are paid out of this appropriation.

Mr. GALLINGER. The hour of 2 has arrived. Does the Vice-President desire to lay before the Senate the unfinished business?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, it is the duty of the Chair to lay before the Senate the unfinished business, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. A bill (S. 1575) to amend an act entitled "An act to regulate commerce."

Mr. PERKINS. I hope we may have a vote on the appropriation bill.

Mr. CULLOM. The unfinished business may be informally laid aside, of course.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Unless there is objection, the unfinished business will be temporarily laid aside. The Senator from New Hampshire will proceed.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, when the Senate adjourned last evening it was my purpose to make some brief observations on the amendment which the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. BUTLER] submitted in the matter of granting pensions to Confederate soldiers, and I now want to occupy a very brief time in saying that the speech of the Senator from North Carolina was one that I think might well have been omitted.

The Senator, for instance, declared that he was not a traitor or the son of a traitor. I wish to say that no Northern Senator during the eight years of my service in this body has ever made a suggestion of that kind, and hence the Senator's declaration was gratuitous and unnecessary.

It is a trifle late, and, it seems to me, very inopportune, in these days of conciliation and good feeling between the North and the South, for any Senator to argue, or rather reargue, the questions that were forever settled by the unfortunate war from 1861 to 1865. It is certainly an unfortunate time for a Senator from a Southern State to thrash over the old straw of that memorable conflict. The question of State rights, as argued by the Senator from North Carolina, was submitted to the arbitrament of the sword and settled in that way. No good can possibly come from its discussion at this late day; and I was pleased to hear the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. BATE] and the Senator from Alabama [Mr. PETTUS], two distinguished Confederate soldiers, express themselves as strongly opposed to reviving the memories of that cruel war, and express disapproval of the amendment that the Senator from North Carolina proposed to offer, but which he wisely withheld.

Now, Mr. President, I have noticed what many newspapers of the South have said on this subject, as well as the action that many bodies of Confederate soldiers have taken, and I say it is to the credit of the Confederate soldiers that they do not, to any great extent, indorse the views of the Senator from North Carolina in the matter of pensioning those who fought in the Confederate army. A day or two ago I noticed that the Pickett-Buchanan Camp of Confederate Veterans, of Norfolk, adopted a resolution, which I will read:

> It is against such mock humanity and false pretensions that this camp desires to record its indignant protest. The Confederate soldier is unwilling to be placed on the pension rolls of the United States or to become the recipient of any of its bounties. The time can never come when he would feel honored by any such mistaken generosity, and no political art nor sophistry shall place him in this false position.

That is good sense, good logic, and genuine patriotism, and I believe it is largely shared by the men who fought in the Confederate army in the war that we are all trying to forget. I say I am pleased to know that that is the sentiment of the people of the South largely, and the Senator from North Carolina acted very wisely in withdrawing the amendment he proposed to offer, and I trust the proposition may never be revived by any man, South or North.

Now, Mr. President, a single word in answer to the Senator from Maryland [Mr. GORMAN]. We all wish that the pension appropriations might be less than they are, but, unfortunately, we can not control that matter. These appropriations are made according to laws that have been enacted and placed upon the statute book. As long as they remain there they will have to be executed.

During the last year 64,351 names were added to the pension roll, and from death and all other causes only 46,651 were dropped from the rolls, so that there was a net increase of 17,700 names. It is to be remembered, too, Mr. President, that there are on file in the Pension Bureau to-day nearly half a million of applications for increase of pensions, and I am free to say that I do not see, having given this matter some thoughtful consideration, any reason to believe that during the next few years, at least, there will be any material reduction from the amount of appropriation that is carried in the pending bill.

The war with Spain will undoubtedly increase the pension appropriation from year to year for some years to come, and while the old soldiers are going to die off very rapidly during the next ten years, it is safe for me to say, speaking frankly on this question, that when the time will arrive that the annual appropriation for pensions will be materially reduced is purely problematical. I know that some Senators in the past have ventured prophecies on this subject, and their prophecies have not been fulfilled. I will not enter the field of prophecy in this matter, Mr. President, but will frankly say to the Senate and to the country that as chairman of the Committee on Pensions, having occasion to examine this subject from time to time with some care, it is my opinion that the pension appropriation will not be materially lessened from the amount carried in this bill for several years to come unless there is a radical revision of the pension laws, which I do not anticipate.

I trust the bill will be promptly passed.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill is on its final passage. The question is, Shall the bill pass?

The bill was passed.

Resolved, That the business of the Senate be now suspended in order that fitting tribute may be paid to his memory.

Resolved, That a copy of these resolutions be transmitted by the Secretary of the Senate to the family of the deceased, and that as a further mark of respect, the Senate will, at the conclusion of these ceremonies, stand adjourned.

Mr. CULLOM. Mr. President, I gave notice a few days ago that I would to-day call from the table a resolution adopted by the House of Representatives, announcing the death of EDWARD DEAN COOKE, lately a Representative from the Sixth district of Illinois.

It becomes a very solemn duty, Mr. President, to ask the Senate to put aside for the day questions of interest for the living and to unite in paying tribute to the memory of the honored friend whose genial presence is no longer seen amongst us. EDWARD DEAN COOKE was perhaps not known to all the Senators of this body, as he had but just entered his second term in Congress when he was called to his final account. He departed this life suddenly and unexpectedly on the morning of June 24, 1897.

I knew him well. He was a man of strong convictions of duty, never wavering from the line which his conscience and judgment approved and marked out for him. His life was pure, always guided by his convictions. His fidelity to his friends was unchanging, and to them he was as true as steel. He always carried with him the certain evidence of nobility of mind and loveliness of character.

Mr. COOKE was a native of the State of Iowa, where his early years were spent, and where he acquired that education which fitted him for the career in life in which he afterwards was so successful. He had there chosen the profession of law for his life avocation, and had prepared to engage in the practice, when with his widowed mother he came to Illinois and established himself in Chicago. He soon became identified with the business and the citizens of Chicago, and there practiced his chosen profession for about ten years. In due time the Republicans of the district in which he resided nominated and elected him as a member of the house of representatives in the general assembly of his adopted State of Illinois. While he was in the legislature it was my privilege to know him.

In the legislature he soon became a leading and influential member. He was a young man, attractive, courteous, and pleasant to all, and by his agreeable and kindly manner became one of the most popular men in the assembly. At the close of his term in the legislature he returned to his profession, in which he was rapidly achieving reputation and success, when he was called upon to become the Republican candidate for Representative in Congress from his district, and was elected. After serving his term with eminent ability he was again nominated and elected by a large majority, thus receiving the approval of his course as a Representative.

It is not common that a man so young is found so well equipped for public duties. At almost his very starting out in life he was called to the disposition of important public and political matters, which the pursuit of his profession aided him in properly considering. His aptness in the study of conditions, as well of public as of private significance, soon became known and understood. His career soon became an assured success. His methods were admirable. He was systematic and logical in everything. When in the exercise of his abilities in the line of official duty, at the head of an important Committee on Elections in the House of Representatives, I had occasion and opportunity to note the earnestness and sincerity, the integrity and love of justice, which characterized his actions. His personality was agreeable, and his relations with his associates and fellow-Representatives were most cordial.

But in the very midst of the early years of a life which gave promise of such an enticing future the hand of God reached down from heaven and took EDWARD DEAN COOKE to the Father's home.

While engaged in the discharge of his official duties at Washington on the 24th of June 1897, in an unexpected moment, he was stricken down with a sudden illness, and in a brief time his spirit had passed from its earthly tenement to the world beyond. He died in the very height of young, vigorous manhood, and left us never to return. At 10 in the evening he was in the vigor of health; but when the morning came, he had joined the great majority.

Every Senator knows of the sad occurrence of yesterday in the Supreme Court of the United States, where our former associate in the Senate, who was afterwards an honored Cabinet officer of this Government, suddenly met the summons of his God, and has entered his final appearance in the highest court of all. How little do we know what may be in store for us from day to day! The sudden and unforeseen taking off of those who are in the vigor of youth and health reminds us of the utter uncertainty of human life. To-day men are in health; to-morrow they die and are laid in the grave. The march of the world goes on, and so it has been from the beginning. So it has been since the sun first shone above, and so it will continue to be until the trumpet shall sound the last note of time and the stars shall wander from their settings in the blue sky.

The House of Representatives of the United States has suffered a loss. The State of Illinois has lost from its register of wise and good legislators in Congress an excellent and honorable man. The city of his home mourns the loss of a good citizen and the bereaved family will never forget their departed son and brother.

Many times, Mr. President, during the last two years we have been called upon to lay aside our daily duties as legislators, and one Senator and another, each in his own way, has given expression of his estimate and often of his affection for our departed colleagues in one or the other branch of Congress. This ceremony has in a brief period been engaged in many times on account of the death of members of the Senate and the House of Representatives.

To-day we mourn a genial friend who had hardly opened the doorway to what seemed to give sure promise of a great and useful life. EDWARD D. COOKE was a friend whose greeting I loved to hear, a friend whom I loved to meet, and whose cheerful voice was always a delight to me. According to the ordinary course of nature he should have had many years to live. It does not seem natural that he should be taken and that I should remain to speak these words of kindly reminiscence. He has learned the mystery of living and dying. He has tested the verity of the hereafter and has measured the boundaries of time. He has looked into the horizon of the illimitable future and has crossed the border land of the eternal world. These wondrous things have been his to know and to enjoy. He can not see them, and know them, and enjoy them, for us. We shall meet to-morrow what he has met to-day. We shall cross the valley but a step behind him. If he is on the Mount Pisgah of that Universal World beyond, we may respond to his welcome before the sun goes down.

I can never think of ED COOKE as having gone far away. He is just over there. He is but a step from us, and I almost feel impelled to listen for that clear and cheerful voice, as musical as a harp—I have heard it a hundred times—never a discord in its tone. Like the silvery ripple of a brook, its recollection is a pleasure, its memory is a classic.

Ambition! Yes, he had ambition, but it was an ambition which dealt justly. His ambition never sought to pull another down. He sought to rise, but he scorned to rise by injuring another. He loved to make friends that he might have friends, not that he might use them. He sought to do right that he might be right.

To him, the highest aim was "duty." He evaded nothing which he deemed his duty. And if he had known that death approached, he would not have selfishly evaded that duty. And now that he is dead I would not call him back to life. In my selfish love for him I could wish him with us again, but as I fully believe it is well with him, I have it not in my heart to wish him again a child of earth. He has seen the glory of the coming of the Lord, and his soul is marching on.

Mr. ALLISON. Mr. President, I was not aware until last evening that the Senator from Illinois [Mr. CULLOM] intended to call up to-day the resolutions from the House of Representatives relative to the death of the Hon. EDWARD DEAN COOKE, but I can not refrain from paying a sincere, though brief and inadequate tribute to his memory.

He was born in a village near the city of Dubuque, where I have lived for more than forty years. Very early in his life his widowed mother came to that city to reside. So I knew her well, as I also well knew Mr. COOKE as a boy, as a lawyer, as a citizen, and as a public official.

He had not the good fortune to receive a collegiate education. His youthful training was received chiefly in the public schools of the city of Dubuque, which then, as now, afforded unusal opportunities for securing an excellent education. He had the fortune, however, to live in that portion of the State of Iowa which was first settled by the good people from the older States of the Union, so that at the time of his birth and during his youth the city in which he resided was an old and well-ordered community. He had the inestimable benefit through all these years of the influence of a most intelligent Christian mother.

After completing his education in the public schools he entered one of the leading law offices in my city and was there engaged for some two or three years as a student and clerk, being always faithful to every obligation and every duty. He subsequently came to this city, where he secured temporary employment, attended the most excellent law school of the Columbian University, and was graduated there after taking the usual course. Then he moved to the city of Chicago, finding that city, as so many others have found it, to be a place where a young man has the widest opportunity of successful life either in business or in a profession. After that I lost sight of him for several years, but learning, of course, more or less concerning him from his family and friends in my city.

I well remember when he was elected to the legislature of the State of Illinois. His election was regarded by his old friends and companions in Dubuque as a significant illustration of the progress he was making in his new home.

I was glad to greet him here some three years ago as a member of the House of Representatives. During his first term he was a member of the Committee on Elections, and in the next Congress so highly was he respected by those in authority in that House that he was assigned to the Committee on Banking and Currency, one of the most important committees of the body.

He inherited a gentle manner and absolute integrity which carried him through all the years of his life. He was clear-headed, strong-minded, and gifted with remarkable capacity for expressing his views upon any topic with which he was called upon to deal. His ability, with his integrity, his industry, and his kindly and genial manners, enabled him to rise rapidly in the estimation of his immediate neighbors, in the estimation of the people of the city of Chicago, and in the estimation of the people of the district which he so ably represented.

Knowing Mr. COOKE well, as I did; knowing his purity of character, his high motive and purpose of serving his people, his State, and his country, I profoundly regret, as I am sure do all who knew him, that he was so early cut off from his field of usefulness and carried to the realm beyond.

Mr. President, I loved EDWARD D. COOKE as a boy, as a man, as a citizen, and as a Representative, and therefore I have felt moved to pay this humble though sincere tribute to his memory.

[Mr. MASON addressed the Senate. See Appendix.]

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the adoption of the resolutions submitted by the Senator from Illinois [Mr. CULLOM].

The resolutions were unanimously agreed to; and (at 5 o'clock and 16 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Saturday, January 28, 1899, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

FRIDAY, January 27, 1899.

The House met at 12 o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. HENRY N. COUDEN.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

ARMY REORGANIZATION.

Mr. HULL. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the Army bill.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, Mr. PAYNE in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 11022.

Mr. HULL. Mr. Chairman, I yield twenty minutes at least to my colleague [Mr. HENDERSON], and will yield him a further five if necessary.

Mr. HENDERSON. Mr. Chairman, I find myself peculiarly situated with respect to this bill. I have been since I can remember opposed to war, as a rule. Last summer, in the early stages of the discussion, I planted myself squarely against it, and only surrendered and fell in with the war-spirit movement when every part of the country called for war and the President recommended it. I foresaw then some of the troubles we would have, although I did not begin to anticipate that the difficulties at our immediate door would carry us to another hemisphere, 7,000 miles from our shores, and open up new and unthought-of problems to our people.

I look with aversion upon increasing the Regular Army of my country. I hope that we will not find it necessary to establish a standing army of 100,000 men. I am willing, in view of the new conditions that surround us, to cheerfully support a proposition raising the Regular Army to 50,000 or 60,000; beyond that I hope that I will not have to go. But if we are to go beyond that, let it not be by fixing the limit at 100,000, but lodge the discretion in the President to go beyond 50,000 or 60,000 if the conditions of the country should so advise, if it becomes an absolute necessity.

I have faith in the President. I would have faith in any President, Republican or Democrat, on that question, surrounded by the people that govern in this country. But after you raise the standard it is hard to lower it. Plant an army of 100,000 regulars in this country and it will be no easy task to reduce it. I would rather move slowly, cautiously, and safely; it is easier to increase than it is to cut down, and once established, there will be many interested in keeping up a great standing army. I can not see great necessity for it. Certainly with the Spaniards driven out of Cuba, and when we were all so wrought upon about the patriotic Cubans, who now are with us, we ought to be able to get along policing that island, with the United States and the Cubans in harmony and the Spaniards no longer there. Conditions in Cuba do not call for a great army.

Now, I do not know how to reach this. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MARSH] gave notice of an amendment that he would offer. Whatever is done with this bill, which in the main is a wise and good one, should be done by friendly hands—those friendly to the Army and friendly to the country. I am not prepared to go through this bill and tender an amendment here and an amendment there, leaving it on the basis of 50,000 or 60,000 men properly officered. I could not do that and do it wisely. If those who are on the committee and familiar with this matter would take the lead in it, I will follow. But if there is no other remedy, I will support a motion to recommit this bill to the Committee on Military Affairs with instructions to recast the bill on a basis of 50,000 or 60,000 men, if you please, and to report back forthwith to the House, so that it will have the right of way to come back and receive immediate consideration.

These are my general views in regard to this bill. I touch it carefully, for entertaining the confidence I do in our Chief Executive, and with the earnest desire that I have to do what is best for my country in these trying times, I want to move with care in this matter. But I do not want unnecessarily to increase taxation upon the people by increasing and giving a large standing army. We have nothing that calls for it; our own people are peaceful. We will, without force, manage ourselves in this country, and there is absolutely nothing in the United States to draw upon us the guns of the army or the navy of any other country—nothing. Then why impose unnecessary taxation upon the American people?

Passing from that, we are having, Mr. Chairman, I am sorry to say, a demonstration of the "kickers" in the consideration of this bill. It seems as though some men are bound to kick about everything. That is the only word that clearly expresses my meaning—a kicker. We have had kicking in this country from the time that this war got fairly under way. We have some men that kick at the President of the United States. I am sorry to see that the chief kicker is not in his seat this morning. I refer to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. JOHNSON]. We have men who kick at the Secretary of War, who kick at the staff, kick at the Adjutant-General of the Army, and kick at almost everything and anything done by the powers in control, excepting at the boys who vote. It is an easy thing to kick. The cheapest kind of a fellow can cruelly criticise those clothed with grave responsibilities. The cheapest kind of a statesman is a kicker, and the cheapest kind of laughter and applause is that which comes from the people sustaining the kicker.

The President was criticised on account of the conduct of the war. Then he appointed a commission to investigate it, and the critics began to call it a "stacked commission," and they kicked about the commission. I know nearly every man on that commission. The chairman of it, Maj. Gen. Grenville M. Dodge, from my own State, entering the Union Army at the head of the Fourth Iowa, by his gallantry and pluck soon promoted to a star, and star followed star; wounded desperately, and ordered to the rear by the surgeon, refused to go, and fought his brigade on a stretcher; a man that has been a member of Congress, succeeded Grant and Sherman as president of the Society of the Army of the Tennessee, incorruptible and knowing no fear—that is the kind of men on that commission from first to last. They are not satisfied with having the best and biggest men of the Union on this commission to investigate the war, but they go on and kick at the investigators.

Judging from the speech of my friend from Indiana [Mr. JOHNSON], the President of the United States is almost a criminal. During the sixteen years that I have been on this floor never have I heard a speech that, in my judgment, so much deserved the condemnation of the patriotic hearts of this country, that equaled in vituperation and abuse the speech that fell from the lips of the gentleman from Indiana.

What crime has the President committed? Let us look briefly at the facts of recent history. The President did everything in his power to prevent war, by diplomacy, by agencies of the State Department; by every means known to human wisdom he tried to avert war for his country. Is that the crime of President McKinley?

He found this country wholly unprepared for war. There was not powder enough here to shoot our guns twenty-four hours in the American Navy. We had no arms to speak of, no ambulances, no horses, no surgical instruments, no tents, no clothing, and none of the instrumentalities of war, and no Army even. Was that ideal and peaceful condition of things the crime of the President of the United States?

Quickly he put every powder manufactory in this country under contract to work night and day. Our arsenals were set in motion. Double force put on, knowing no hours, daylight or dark, but for labor. And as in the twinkling of an eye, when the constitutional authorities and the people said "fight," he put this country on a war footing that has been unequaled in speed of preparation in the annals of man. He forced the fighting from the moment that Congress declared war until in one hundred and thirteen days, in two hemispheres, he sunk the enemy's fleet, whipped them on land and sea, and practically wound up the war before the people knew that we had hardly begun. Was that President McKinley's crime?

He fought so vigorously, ended the war so quickly, managing all so wisely, that no complications arose with other nations sympathizing with Spain. Was that his crime? He drove Spain from Cuba, which was the objective point of the war. Was that his crime? He is rapidly putting Cuba in order for securing self-government, as promised by us all at the opening of the war. Is that his offense?

He has taken Porto Rico, the Isle of Pines, and the richest island of the Ladrones for his country and its commerce. Was that his crime?

He has by the guns of his country and by treaty terminated this war and laid before the constitutional powers the work done, submitting it to them, and there he rests. Is that his crime?

This treaty divests Spain of all sovereignty over the Philippines. Ratify it and new problems come. Until ratified the question of the legal ending of this war is still open. Because he has done this work, tendered this treaty to the Senate, and awaits constitutional approval or disapproval, has he committed a crime?

The President from start to finish has wisely, calmly, patriotically, bravely carried the mighty problems of the country in his great heart and greater brain—not for a political party, but for his country and his countrymen. Is that his crime? [Prolonged applause.]

Ah! but we are told that he is sending guns to the Philippines, as though indicating a policy not otherwise indicated. Is that a crime? When at war with Spain, it was the duty of the Commander in Chief to attack the enemy where he could hit and hurt. He struck him in the Philippines, and the echo of the blow will ring through coming ages. That blow found the Filipinos struggling uselessly and vainly with Spain, which had held sovereignty there for centuries. This country striking that blow and taking the great city and the great bay—had it not at once and thereby no responsibilities and duties? Until that treaty is ratified the President must hold what by arms we have taken until the sovereignty of Spain is legally removed. Gentleman, is that a crime?

What may be in the brain of the President if that treaty is ratified I know not. For one it is enough for me to know what my duty is. I interrogate myself, and I say that while I can not tell yet what my duty may be (for I do not know what the real conditions are there or what those people want or need), I frankly say to this House and my country that I have the gravest doubts of the wisdom of this country taking the Philippine Islands to govern them as United States territory. [Applause.] I have grave doubts on that question. Eliminating every moral question and looking at it from the standpoint of a member of this American family, which must weigh the expenses and the responsibilities that he is about to assume, if you ask me would I force a government upon the Filipinos against their will, I answer no. [Applause.]

That is my judgment. But when the time comes to settle that question (it is not here now) I must know what my duty to the country is, and I can not tell that without knowing the condition of the Filipinos and what they need and what they want.

The President is assailed because he does not allow Agoncillo to represent the Filipinos in this country. Can the President of the United States recognize any Filipino agent or pretended agent of any single ambitious Filipino until the sovereignty of Spain is divested? Certainly not.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. HENDERSON. And I had only commenced.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT.

The committee informally rose; and the Speaker having taken the chair, a message in writing from the President of the United States was communicated to the House of Representatives by Mr. PRUDEN, one of his secretaries, who also announced that the President has approved and signed bills and joint resolutions of the following titles:

On January 21, 1899:

H. Res. 90. Joint resolution for the improvement of Mystic River, Massachusetts.

On January 24, 1899:

H. Res. 338. Joint resolution to fill vacancies in the Board of Regents of the Smithsonian Institution.

On January 25, 1899:

H. R. 10709. An act to authorize the city of Saginaw, Mich., to beautify and use as a public park the United States post-office property in said city, under rules and regulations prescribed by the Secretary of the Treasury;

H. R. 1037. An act to remove the charge of desertion standing against the name of Patrick Dougherty, Company A, Thirteenth New York Volunteer Infantry;

H. R. 5112. An act to remove the charge of desertion from and to correct the military record of Capt. William Churchill, late a private of Company K, Second Regiment of United States Cavalry;

H. R. 314. An act for the relief of William H. King; and

H. R. 421. An act providing for additional circuit judges in the Fifth and Sixth judicial circuits.

ARMY REORGANIZATION.

The committee resumed its session.

Mr. HOWE. Mr. Chairman, while I am in favor of increasing our Army to a reasonable extent, as has been suggested by the gentleman from Iowa, to 60,000, I am still more in favor of increasing our Navy and adding by every means possible to the power and strength of our coast defenses.

If the United States at this time should be compelled to engage in war with either of the great naval powers of the world, our first concern would be the strength of our Navy and the extent of our coast defenses.

Appropriations for this purpose are essential to the future protection and safety of the Republic.

In my opinion, an army at this time of more than 60,000 men is without warrant. Each of our States should have a thoroughly organized and equipped State militia, adequate for every emergency and from which a volunteer army could be recruited of at least 500,000 men.

The whole nation is in one sense a standing army, ever ready and willing to be sacrificed for the life of the nation.

With proper coast defenses and a powerful Navy, equal to that of the greatest naval power in the world, we would have no need to fear being invaded by a foreign foe, for no foreign army would dare to attempt to effect a landing upon our shores.

Mr. Chairman, again I say an army of 60,000 is sufficient for our every need. It would give us an army of 7,000 in Cuba, 3,000 in Porto Rico, 25,000 in the Philippines, and 25,000 to man our fortifications and look after the Indian reservations.

As to the disposition of our recently acquired territories and the fruits of victory over Spain, let me say that I have full confidence in the good judgment of our President and in the wisdom of Congress in bringing about a solution that will not only be satisfactory to our own people but to the rest of the world and, I may add, in the highest interests of civilization and the upbuilding of humanity throughout the world.

Mr. SULZER. I yield to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. ROBINSON].

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, it had not been my purpose at first to speak on this pending measure, but the growing dangers in the far East summon the courage and patriotism of every American in the land. The channels of news are laden with threatenings and menace that must bring to the thoughtful the most portentous foreboding. While we deliberate here the military there may have kindled a spark that will cause a conflagration that may take thousands of lives to quench and millions of treasures to subdue. It is well that we have a censorship on the wires from the Philippines, and its existence is ominous. It were not best we knew the situation. Persons familiar with the people on those islands and with their tropical country tell me, as others have learned, that we can never conquer an armed rebellion in those islands. The soil breeds insurrection, the very air infects it, and the long years of turmoil and disturbance that have been the unhappy lot of those inhabitants, chafing under the domineering power of Spain, will continue till, by some evolution within themselves—until under some rule of the survival of the fittest—they establish for themselves a government and govern themselves; and until then all nations who ask dominion at the price of liberty will suffer as others under like conditions have suffered before.

If it be a part of the purposes of this bill enlarging the standing Army to hold, forcibly and against the will of the inhabitants, the Philippine Islands, then we come to the beginning of our misfortunes.

In 18 pages of the report by the majority of the committee presenting this bill no reference by name is made to those islands, although the chairman of the committee, the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HULL], the introducer of the bill, has access to the fountain head of information. His silence is significant. True the name is once mentioned, but only by way of illustration and entirely de hors the policy and purposes of the administration in reference to forcible retention.

When this report was filed a few weeks ago the islands were still upon the earth, from 1,200 to 2,000 in number, boiling, steaming, and festering beneath a tropical sun, the land infested with vermin, the death-breeding swamps abounding with poisonous snakes and reptiles, and the native inhabitants (there being but 1 of our race for every 200 natives) a proper concomitant to the surroundings I have outlined.

But, sir, with this silence on the part of the majority, with the situation that is known to prevail, I will assume that it may be one of the purposes of this enlarged standing army to conquer the Philippines. Indeed, the peace treaty is unratified to-day only because those in charge of it so far have declined to yield to a resolution similar to that passed for Cuba.

The war, sir, was begun, and through brilliant victories carried on, for humanity, to relieve the oppressed and not to oppress; fought to liberate and not to enslave. As a war measure, we struck at one of Spain's weakest points, the Philippines, and by a naval victory by Dewey and his men peerless in the annals of the world, Spain's fleet went to the bottom and we triumphed over the Philippines.

The Filipinos had for years been waging war against Spain in those islands, and were in possession of something like two-thirds of the territory at the time of the battle of Manila, and cooperated with us in driving Spain to defeat.

I shall not recount, sir, the glories of that Spanish war, they were unparalleled in every point of view, and were only such as would come to free-born Americans fighting for the eternal principles of liberty and free government.

In this connection let us again recall the resolution of Congress declaring war, and find therein the purposes of it:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, First. That the people of the island of Cuba are, and of right ought to be, free and independent.

* * * * * * *

Fourth. That the United States hereby disclaims any disposition or intention to exercise sovereignty, jurisdiction, or control over said island except for the pacification thereof, and asserts its determination, when that is accomplished, to leave the government and control of the island to its people.

I am opposed to this large standing army because it is against the traditional history of our country, because it is a power designed to destroy and not build up, because our national history from the beginning of our existence till now has taught us that the bulwark of our strength is not in standing armies but in citizen soldiers. I am in favor of citizen soldiers, volunteers, and not of standing armies, because the manifold achievements of our nation in the field have come from the loyalty and power of volunteers, who, by their valor in time of war and patriotism in time of peace, have made our nation great and strong.

I am opposed to a great standing army because human experience teaches that if our liberties are ever assailed or subverted it will come from the menacing force of the standing army, which till now has been unknown in all our grand progress as a nation for liberty, law, and equal justice.

That it will repress the State militia and citizen soldiers and so far repress patriotism among our people is another ground of objection. I am opposed to a taxation of the masses by a scale measured by millions to provide this menacing meteor which, through over a century of splendid advance with volunteer soldiers, a standing army has been regarded by all statesmen as an evil to our institutions.

If it be the purpose of the Administration to peaceably or forcibly take the Philippines, it is due to the coordinate branches of the Government and to the people to so declare. It is sufficient, however, for this discussion that we are opposed to a large standing army that might be employed to subject these people and destroy their liberty.

It may be that Spain did sell us for $20,000,000 something she did not have by clear title and could not deliver, but in this dilemma we need ask no favors. We know the Filipinos aided us in our war for humanity for Cuba; before we struck a blow they had in their possession the larger portion of the islands. We know this, and now sooner than depart from our traditional policy, sooner than efface our love of freedom and love of fellowmen, pay the $20,000,000 as a purchase price of peace and liberty, instead of assuming a war and entanglements with our late allies that will cost us before the end is reached hundreds of millions of dollars. Our pride will be less wounded; in fact, it will add new glory to our cause and new luster to the American name for having fought with blood for and bought with treasure the liberty of a downtrodden and oppressed nation of the world.

Many of our ships are hovering about the islands. Ships and men are still being sent. Are they there to aid in the cause of liberty? If so, why not so declare? When this is once known upon those islands the Filipino troops that prevented our soldiers from landing by force and arms at Iloilo, those who menace us at Manila, will disappear—arms ready to fight for liberty there will open to receive us. They will welcome us as did we the immortal Lafayette in our glorious fight for independence.

If this be not our policy, then misfortune is upon us—misfortune to be counted by treasure and in lives, and when I speak of lives I mean as well those lives of kin who are interested in brave young soldiers who have gone to that disease-ladened land, and who, while they wear the uniform of Americans and obey the orders, still have American hearts that beat for liberty for all mankind.

I have attended the funeral obsequies of heroes who responded to call of country and sacrified their lives in that war of humanity for Cuba. I have helped to bear them to the tomb. There assembled at those open graves were thousands of Americans who, with bowed heads and bated breath, pledged themselves to keep their memory fresh and green. Why? Because they lost their lives—they were heroes in a cause American, fought for principles American, died Americans, fighting for liberty and humanity, not for oppression and injustice.

Ten million Filipinos will not yield to the people of the United States while liberty is within their view any more than would 3,000,000 Americans yield to Britain. Their sentiments will be now what ours were as described by Lord Chatham, who thundered his eloquence in the British Parliament in the following words, which I read:

Will not a country which can produce 3,000,000 people, wronged and insulted as they are, start up, like hydras, in every corner, and gather fresh strength from fresh opposition? Nay, what dependence can you have upon the soldiery, the unhappy engines of your wrath? They are Englishmen, who must feel for the privileges of Englishmen. Do you think that these men can turn their arms against their brethren? Surely not. A victory must be to them a defeat, and carnage a sacrifice.

Will liberty-loving men fight against liberty?

The Filipinos have fought so long for liberty and to throw off the Spanish yoke that we can not stop their clash of arms or change their master. We can not conquer them and save our tradition and preserve our self-respect. We can not conquer them and save our treasures and the lives of our brave young soldiers. We can not do both. Which will we do? In God's name leave the answer to the kindred, mothers, wives, and sisters of those who are now out on the ships watching these Filipinos; leave it to the thoughtful men; leave it to the laborers of the land, who ever have fought its battles for liberty, and who now seek a policy for protection to their own home interests, and not the subjugation of others.

In that island of 10,000,000 people, untutored in arts of civilization, except, perchance, it can be said that the art of war is an art of civilization, if you send 50,000 soldiers to conquer and pay fifty million per annum to accomplish this, how far into the interior will you penetrate on these islands through jungles, swamps, and deadly fever? Pray, how many of these 2,000 islands will you hold against the native population with an army of fifty thousand, and how much will it cost you in this mad course against liberty, and how long will this drain continue? From whom will it be collected, and who must bear the burden in the end but the laboring men, the producers of the country?

Nor will it be an equal struggle. The Philippine Islands are 10,000 miles from our seat of government and 7,000 miles from our western shore. We must cover this expanse in sending ships, troops, and munitions of war. Once there, the Filipinos in arms, ensconced amid their fever-breeding swamps, will be secure from the reach of our soldiers. God has given them a climate in which they can live and fight for liberty, while our soldiers will be stricken and die in that death-dealing clime. Many a Hyder Ali exists to-day, many are yet unborn, who will rise to plague and destroy, to hang like black clouds on the declivities of the mountains with their followers, to sweep down as did that ferocious chieftain on the plains of the Carnatic, to spread fire, slaughter, and annihilation to their oppressors. It will indeed require a very large standing army to dislodge them from the swamps and mountains of those islands while they fight for their country, home, and fireside, as our fathers fought for theirs.

To this purpose and for this end it is said, sir, that we shall create a large standing army and reverse the traditional policy that our nation is sustained by the affection the people have for its institutions and make the policy now a standing army, not to preserve our own liberties, but to deny to foreign lands the liberty we would enjoy.

Why engage in this dangerous and unholy course? I hope that some inspiration of an all-wise Providence will guide men to the performance of their patriotic duty. Retrace in the history of our country and find the sentiments of our fathers in their struggle for liberty and tell me in your minds will not those sentiments inspire others in their battle for independence?

Listen to the sentiments of John Adams, as expressed by Daniel Webster:

> Read this declaration at the head of the Army; every sword will be drawn from its scabbard and the solemn vow uttered to maintain it or to perish on the bed of honor. Publish it from the pulpit; religion will approve it, and the love of religious liberty will cling round it, resolved to stand with it or fall with it. Send it to the public halls; proclaim it there, let them hear it who heard the first roar of the enemy's cannon, let them see it who saw their brothers and their sons fall on the field of Bunker Hill and in the streets of Lexington and Concord, and the very walls will cry out in its support.
> Sir, I know the uncertainty of human affairs, but I see, I see clearly through this day's business. You and I, indeed, may rue it. We may not live to the time when this declaration shall be made good. We may die; die colonists; die slaves; die, it may be, ignominiously, and on the scaffold. Be it so. Be it so. If it be the pleasure of heaven that my country shall require the poor offering of my life, the victim shall be ready at the appointed hour of sacrifice, come when that hour may. But while I do live, let me have a country, or at least the hope of a country, and that a free country.

If we prosecute a war to subject people, to destroy liberty, we will stifle that splendid American sentiment so often heard in the late war and in all our wars fought by volunteers.

> I am writing to you, mother, knowing well what you will say
> When you read, with tearful fondness, all I write to you to-day;
> Knowing well the flame of ardor on a loyal mother's part
> That must kindle with each impulse, with each throbbing of your heart.
> I have heard my country calling for her sons who still were true,
> I have ved that country, mother, only next to God and you;
> And soul is springing forward to resist her bitter foe—
> Can I , my dearest mother? Tell me, mother, can I go?

Our Army, both regular and volunteer, must be made up of the young men; but, sir, if we start a war to deprive the Filipinos of their liberty, no such impulses like this will be found in that war to warm the patriotic heart, "to challenge brave of soul to come," or to teach the youths the lessons of their duty to their country. Children at school must seal the pages of their country's history if we now seek out to conquer those who cry for liberty.

They must turn again to ancient history of wars of conquest, of wars of plunder, of wars to gratify ambition, of wars fought under policies which by the universal voice of civilized man to-day were errors and the forerunner of ruin and decay. If they must take these histories up, let them not lay them down, but pursue them to the end, for there is recorded the wasting away of all nations that ever sought to oppress their fellow-men.

We should teach the rising generation that if we would avoid the calamities of others that have preceded we must avoid the rocks on which they split. Let them study the lessons of ancient Greece and Rome. Then it was that an Alexander would leave his country with his warriors, go in conquest to search for glory and for gold and fame immortal, reaching the enemy, would traverse his country, leaving behind him like the fiery meteor at night a great red trail of blood, returning to his country when all others had fallen, this archangel of a misguided ambition would weep amid the plaudits of his countrymen because there were no other worlds to conquer. Rome and Greece have disappeared; the ruined tower and the crumbling wall bear no better evidence of the misguided energies of early man than they do of the fate and folly of their example.

No nation ever has held colonies by force that did not have to answer for charges of rapine, devastation, tyranny, and bloodshed. It ever has been so; it will be so till the end of time.

To forcibly annex these islands is to throw to the winds our vaunted boasts of a century; to destroy the sweet and inspiring sentiment, "This is the land of the free, the home of the brave;" to blot out the principle that "all just powers of government are derived from the consent of the governed," and to ingraft on our reformed Constitution that we may tax without giving representation; to write all over our history calumnies and lies; to turn back the tide of all our great battles for liberty to degeneracy and sin, and to write the hated words "kingdom," "empire," "czarism," and "tyranny" all over our proud banner of state; aye, more, to serve notice on the nations of the world that this proud, liberty-loving people are ready, for greed and gain, to become the common enemy and oppressor of our fellow-man. When this is accomplished, I say to the labor interests of the country, "Then you and I and all of us fall down, whilst bloody treason flourishes over us."

To our credit let it be said that we have never before entered upon such a field. I pray to God we never shall. Charged against us solely in this line are the traces of the red man's gloomy monuments as he receded toward the Pacific as "westward the course of empire took its way." This is still thought by many to be a dark page in our history. True, in early time we drove the Indian almost from the face of the earth. We robbed him of his home. To-day we put aside these thoughts. We relieve the still, small voice by the belief that the Indian, like the mound-builder, filled his sphere and was destined to pass away; that this land was destined for something better than to have its forests the habitation of the red man, his only occupation the chase. We console ourselves with the thought that as he warred with his kind on the principle of extermination when we wanted his home, with this principle on the one side, it must of necessity have been adopted on the other.

Sir, whatever national crime may have been thus committed, it secured homes for freemen, where freemen could live and prosper. To-day we have within our legitimate and appropriate sphere vast forests and prairies, unbroken soil of culture, sealed mines of treasured millions; these are the fruits yet to come to civilized endeavor for us and for future generations. All this, with a latitude, clime, and natural advantages unsurpassed on the globe, invite us to pursue our natural and proper objects at home, free from international entanglements and outside disturbances.

This, sir, so far has been our cardinal principle of national policy. We have for a century rallied round the Monroe doctrine and grown strong and great. To-day our great prosperity is heralded at home and abroad. It is proudly claimed that we lead in foreign trade all nations of the earth but one. These conditions were not produced under the régime of a large standing army.

Where do you get your slogan to deprive anyone of liberty? Do you get it from the Bible; do you get it from the Declaration of Independence; do you get it from the Constitution; do you get it from that lofty policy that so long has governed us as a nation, or do you get it from the declaration of war against Spain to free Cuba? Oh, sir, let the sweet hosannas going up from the throats of Cubans in rejoical at their liberty enter the ears of those who would enslave 10,000,000 of their brothers 10,000 miles away. [Applause.] No, sir; no inspiration for that course has come from the sources I have named. It comes from the mean, selfish, and sordid behest of commercial harpies and pirates, who have no more regard for liberty of man against their standard of profits than has the wild Sioux Indian for law and order.

Henry Clay, speaking in Congress in sympathy for the Greeks, in reference to the attempt that had been made by the commercial interests to alarm Congress by the dangers to our trade in the Mediterranean, said:

> Ah, sir, what shall it profit a man if he gain the whole world and lose his own soul, or what shall it avail a nation if it save the whole of a miserable trade and lose its liberties?

A war in the Philippines for a few dollars to commercial interests, at the cost of $5 for each, to the Government, to gain these benefits to private individuals, and at untold sacrifices to our laboring men. It needs no profound knowledge of constitutional law, interpreting that instrument in the light of the Declaration of Independence, to know that when a territory becomes a part of our country its inhabitants become our fellow-citizens. On the absorption of these islands and the incoming into our body politic of these "distinguished and intelligent fellow Filipino citizens to be," they will be brought at once in competition with our own labor, which already is in the severest field of competition.

Another hand is seen in this molding of our policy. The governments of the Old World who believe in monarchy and tyranny, and who are jealous of our growing strength and power, under a form of government for liberty, may well look on this scheme of furtive ambition with a certain satisfaction of witnessing the end—a waning power, loss of prestige and power among the nations of the world. We may owe Britain a debt of gratitude for her ministrations in the late Spanish war, but let us not do it at the expense of forfeiture of ancient landmarks of liberty; let us rather repay kind in kind by showing favors to her British subjects just north of our border. A vast field is there presented for their good and for ours.

I shall make no comment on the open-door policy which must of necessity be adopted in the Philippines if expansion, peaceable or forcible, should be the policy, nor point out the advantage that other nations would have over us under such a plan by reason of their nearness and other points of vantage, for this is no part of my object in speaking.

I am content to follow the statesmen of former years in this great and momentous crisis. Who can believe that the statesmen of those years can be safely supplanted by the statesmen of this hour? The early fathers in their day were called outlaws for fighting for their independence, but they persevered and won. We followed them and preserved our liberty; but we can not long preserve it if we deny the boon to others. He that speaks for liberty for himself or for others speaks for the Declaration of Independence. Its principles are not new; they never were. They have existed from the beginning of that enlightened Christianity that marks the onward and upward progress of the race. They were embalmed in form in that instrument; but the principles have existed from the first, and will exist when all that is to-day has moldered to dust; will exist so long as the human race survives and retains a spark of love for fellow-man.

We settled the question of love of liberty, and settled it right, in the Revolutionary war; we settled the question of religious and political freedom in that war. The proof is still preserved in the Declaration of Independence and in the Constitution. Those battles of Concord, Lexington, Saratoga, and Bunker Hill were fought, not by standing armies, but by citizen soldiers; they were fought, as all our great battles were, by the laboring men of the country. Upon them rest the glory of our achievements. Who established this nation; who gave it its strength; who fought for its glory? Go ask it of history years from to-day, and the answer will be: The great laboring interests of the country. You would oppress them, oppress them with taxation to create a great standing army to increase their burdens and misfortunes.

Have the American people, have Representatives here, forgotten the history, the cause, the results of our war for liberty? Let us follow Washington, Jefferson, and Monroe. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Sir, Switzerland for ages was the only home of Liberty, and there she dwelt in the mountain fastnesses of the Alps, but she never grew. She came to our shores still an infant in her swaddling clothes. Strong arms rocked her cradle. The lullaby that lulled her to sleep was the voice of belching cannons. She smiled upon us and grew. In infancy she inspired the hand of Jefferson to write the Declaration of Independence. England trembled and in a few years gave up the fight. In young girlhood she held up, for the world to gaze upon, the Constitution. They looked upon it and bowed their heads in admiration. In young womanhood she stirred the American minds and hearts not "to mutiny and rage," but to deeds of fame and glory, to fight for her and for themselves on the American field of valor. They won under a banner that had the legend "Free men and Americans" inscribed across its front; they marched to victory, while the flag of the free, the American flag, floated above them.

She has grown to full womanhood and maturity with 70,000,000 children and supporters; standing out before the world as an angel of light to liberty lovers, shedding her rich effulgence over and irradiating the Western world, aye the world. By her powers she has driven Spain from the Western continent and restored liberty, law, and order to the benighted people of Cuba and secured to that gem of the Antilles a government for free men, as she promised to do. All this, then, has Liberty done in the name of liberty for liberty. Will she now, with this record of her splendid achievements, in the zenith of her magnificent power—will she crush a people underneath her feet, however humble they may be, however ignorant, however feeble, however vicious?

Will she do it? Will she do it? She can not; she will not. Liberty does not want an increased standing army; she never has wanted it; she never will want it; for it stands for the worst and not for the best; it stands for evil and not for good; it stands for tyranny and not for justice.

Let us live in the hope that no evil may come to our country, but that peace and tranquillity may always prevail; but let us be assured that if storms and turmoils do come, our country will be safe. And whether the enemy shall come to lull and beguile us with the soft notes of a lute or to terrify with the bold bugle blast of war, our country will be safe and secure in the love of country and loyalty of its volunteer soldiers, who ever have fought for and ever will fight for and preserve the liberty of the people. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. GRIFFIN. I yield ten minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. GROW].

Mr. GROW. Mr. Chairman, when Thomas Jefferson was inaugurated President, the area of territory of the United States of America was less than 900,000 square miles. The population, by the census of 1800, was a little over five millions, scattered along the Atlantic seaboard, hemmed in by the ocean in front, the wilderness and the savage in the rear.

In 1850 the territorial area of the United States was a little over 3,000,000 square miles and its population 23,000,000. When the declaration of war against Spain passed Congress, the territorial area of the United States was 3,600,000 square miles, and the population was about 75,000,000. In our past history the population has doubled in numbers every thirty years. This vast acquisition of territory began in 1803, not by the expectation or solicitation, in the first place, of the American people. The acquisition of Louisiana came to us not because of our solicitation. Jefferson instructed our ministers to France and Spain to procure, if possible, a landing place at what is now New Orleans for goods for reshipment without the payment of duty, and the free navigation of the Mississippi River. They were authorized to pay for these privileges $2,000,000, if they could not be procured for a less sum. But Napoleon, as if marking out for us the manifest destiny of the great Republic, instructed his secretary of treasury to cede to the United States all the territory received from Spain from the mouth of the river to its source, including both banks, for a fixed compensation.

Our commissioners, Mr. Livingston and Mr. Monroe, were surprised at this proposition, but as it was in the days of sailing vessels, with no means of communicating with their Government at home in reasonable time, they agreed if France should make this cession of territory—double that of the old original thirteen States—we should pay France $15,000,000. This country has never yet taken a foot of soil as a conquest of war alone. All of its acquisitions have been made on the payment of money. Even when our flag floated over the halls of the Montezumas, we paid Mexico $15,000,000 for the territory acquired at the close of that war. With the exception of the Floridas, Alaska, and the Gadsden purchase, all the acquisitions of territory to the United States have come, as I said before, unexpected and unsolicited on our part in the first place.

With the declaration of war with Spain our Army and Navy went forth to conquer the power of Spain in the island of Cuba because it was our neighbor, and in behalf of liberty and humanity. They went forth in a great crusade for the rights of a common humanity. But within a week ten millions of the colonists of Spain, in far-off Asia, were placed under the American flag, and that people relieved from the cruel despotism of Spain that they and their fathers had groaned under for three centuries.

To-day our flag rightfully floats over an island in the Atlantic Ocean, a thousand miles from our eastern shore. In the same manner it floats over a larger island in the Pacific, in far-off Asia, 10,000 miles away. The last rays of parting day scarcely fades from the hillsides of Porto Rico before the morning sun gilds the spires of Manila and the mountain tops of Luzon. What disposition shall be made as to the people in this vast expanse of territory over which our flag floats to-day rests with the American Congress.

What kind of government shall be established will depend on the calm, deliberate judgment of Congress on that question when the treaty of peace with Spain is ratified. Under that treaty it is agreed that Spain shall withdraw her sovereignty from the Philippine Islands and we send her soldiers home. On the 10th of December, 1898, the time of the agreement on a treaty of peace, one volume of the world's history was closed and a new one opened. In the last chapter of that closed volume is recorded that the sovereignty and the flag of Spain have been withdrawn forever from the American continent, a flag that at one time floated over a larger portion of the American hemisphere than that of any other one nation.

What shall be recorded in the new volume on American history depends upon the action of the American people; and when the treaty is ratified the duty and responsibility of Congress will not be how they can shirk the duties and responsibilities thrown upon them by the fortunes of war. It will then become a question of how can the American people best discharge their responsibility to liberty and the common rights of humanity; for it was for that the sword was unsheathed and Spain was required to withdraw her sovereignty from this continent. Any nation in this age of Christian civilization that appeals to war to settle any question must be willing and ought to be ready to discharge all its responsibilities to liberty and humanity cast upon it by the fortunes of war, whether foreseen or not.

Now, it seems to be agreed on all sides that there shall be an increase in the Regular Army, whether it be a few thousand more or less is of little consequence. The flag of our country wherever it is rightfully planted can not be removed with honor to the American people by any power except that which planted it, and so long as patriotism dwells in the American heart and it is loyal to the glorious traditions of a heroic ancestry, over whatever portion of the earth's surface it may rightfully float it will never be lowered except by the same power that raised it. [Applause.]

We have to determine what is to be done with these new acquisitions of territory, what government shall be established, and to determine these questions in view of the rights and happiness of the American people and the rights and happiness of the people that dwell in the new acquisitions. Whatever disposition shall be made and what kind of government is to be established, the same rule applies to the Philippines that applies to Porto Rico. The flag was planted in both by the power of the American nation, and must stay where it was thus planted until the American nation withdraws it. [Loud applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. COX rose.

The CHAIRMAN. For what purpose does the gentleman from Tennessee rise?

Mr. COX. Mr. Chairman, I reserved twenty minutes of my time in the discussion, and the RECORD shows that I reserved it. Now, I do not want to consume that time, but I do not understand exactly what position I am in.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understands that there are eighteen minutes left on that side, and it is controlled by the gentleman from New York [Mr. SULZER] if he desires to claim recognition.

Mr. COX. The RECORD will show that when I addressed the House I reserved twenty minutes of my time. I was called down because I requested to be notified at the end of forty minutes.

Mr. GRIFFIN. Mr. Chairman, I am unable to hear what the gentleman's proposition is, but it is the understanding with the gentleman who controls the time on that side [Mr. SULZER] that we may consume the remainder of our time now.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman desire recognition now?

Mr. GRIFFIN. I do; and I will yield fifteen minutes to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. COUSINS].

Mr. COX. Mr. Chairman, do I understand the ruling of the Chair is that when I reserved twenty minutes of my time I am to be taken off the floor by the chairman of the committee on the other side?

The CHAIRMAN. The House decided this question by unanimous consent, dividing the time equally between the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HULL] and the gentleman from New York [Mr. SULZER], and it is not within the control of the committee, or the Chairman of the committee, only to carry out the order of the House. The Chair asked the gentleman from Tennessee for what purpose he rose, and he has stated the purpose. After he made that statement the Chair recognized the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. GRIFFIN], who, in the absence of the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HULL], is dealing out the time on that side of the House, and the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. COUSINS] will be recognized for fifteen minutes.

Mr. COX. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary question.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. COX. The RECORD shows, as I say, that I reserved twenty minutes of my time, and I announced why I did it. Now, then, I do not think my friend on the other side will try to take that twenty minutes away, for it is in the RECORD, and there is no question about it. I did it carefully and with a purpose; that when the discussion went along I would have that twenty minutes remaining. Now, it is not my purpose to say another word on this matter, but it is my purpose to yield back that twenty minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. SULZER], who has been exceedingly kind in the division of time. My only purpose is not to occupy the time, but to give it back to him.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understands the gentleman from Tennessee yields twenty minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. SULZER], and the Chair sees no objection to it, although the Chair thinks that the gentleman from New York will get no great benefit from it, because it can not increase the time remaining on that side.

Mr. GRIFFIN. Mr. Chairman, in the absence of the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. COUSINS] I will yield ten minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. PRINCE].

Mr. PRINCE. Mr. Chairman, there is now pending before the House a bill to reorganize the Army and also to increase the Army. It is properly divided into two questions for consideration. First, should the Army as an army be reorganized? Upon that question it seems to me there ought not to be a question of difference on the part of the members of this House. It is evident to us all that the Army should be reorganized along lines of modern improvements of military affairs and in the modern mode of fighting upon the field of battle. We have in the short war that has just passed away demonstrated to the world that the American soldier on sea and land is the superior of any other soldier in the world. We ought, it seems to me, without any difference of opinion, to be in favor of any measure proposed by this committee along the line of reorganization of making better the Army of this great Republic.

The second proposition, should the Army be increased? Our friends upon the other side, some of them, say, Why do you want a larger army; what is the necessity for it? Without discussing matters which are not at this time proper for this House to consider and discuss, it seems to me that whether the Army should be enlarged from the basis it now is, upon that question, taking into consideration the growth of the Republic, taking into consideration its ability to maintain an army, it seems to me along those lines there ought not to be any difference of opinion.

Some of our friends have taken the position that we are changing from the paths of our fathers; that we are deviating from the well-known position taken by those in early days. In looking at the report as made by the committee of this House upon this bill, I find that in the earlier days we had a small army; that that army increased from time to time relatively, and it kept pace along the line of about 1,000 soldiers to 1,000,000 people. Before the war it was less than a thousand soldiers to 1,000,000 population. Keeping pace along the line with our fathers, we would have a standing army within the limits of the Republic to-day, as it now exists and did exist before the late war, of 70,000 regular soldiers.

Now, in my opinion we ought not to have a standing army beyond 50,000 regular soldiers. We ought to have, in addition to that, a provision in the law that the President of the United States could call out, in addition to the 50,000, if necessary, 50,000 more, and place upon him the responsibility, if the exigency arises, to call upon 50,000 more soldiers to defend the honor and the flag of this Republic here and elsewhere, wherever it is sought to attack it.

And upon the question of force there can be no difference of opinion, it seems to me. The question is to-day, What shall we do with what we have got?—not, How did we acquire it?—not, Why are we in this position? We are here with these people upon our hands, with these questions presenting themselves; and it is our duty, our plain duty, to conduct ourselves as members of this American Congress along the lines of right and justice. Let us then by all means favor this measure, which gives to the Regular Army at least 50,000 men, and gives to the President of the United States the power to enlarge that Army to the extent of 50,000 more if necessary.

Mr. JETT. Under this bill as it now stands, how are you going to give the President such authority?

Mr. PRINCE. We can, let me say to my colleague, at the proper time make an amendment along the line suggested by me, and I believe that it will be done.

As to the question of putting power in the hands of the President, whoever he may be, let me suggest that he is a citizen of the Republic, placed in the Presidential chair by the votes of the people of this Republic. If he does that which the people do not approve, he will be weighed in the balance and found wanting, and will be requested by the voice of the people to step down and out and take his place in the ranks. If, upon the other hand, he does his duty under the law and under his oath, the people will say, "Well done, thou good and faithful servant," and retain him in the position he occupies as President of the United States.

Therefore it seems to me no harm can come to this country, no harm can come to the people, if we organize an army of 50,000 regular soldiers and put the law in such shape that an additional force of 50,000 can be added if necessary.

And along that line I would say that I am in favor, as one member—speaking only for myself, though I believe I voice the wishes of the people of my district—I am in favor of retaining every foot of soil over which the American flag floats except Cuba. I believe that the people have so expressed themselves. I believe that from the day the President started on his Western trip to Omaha, and as he moved about this great Republic, the people, North and South, East and West, approved of his utterances and his suggestions. And I am inclined to think that some of my friends from the Southern portion of this country are not voicing the sentiments of their people, because I did not hear when the President was in the Southland a word in opposition from the press or from the people who heard his utterances to the position that he has maintained along that line, and that is to preserve peace and order in those far-off possessions, and give to those people under the folds of our flag the same inalienable rights which we possess to life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness. [Applause.]

Mr. GRIFFIN. I yield fifteen minutes to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. COUSINS].

Mr. COUSINS. Mr. Chairman, the idea of increasing the Regular Army of the United States was not wholly born of emergencies or necessities which have arisen within the past year. The proposition to increase the Army and the necessity therefor existed prior to the war with Spain and prior to the responsibilities which devolved upon our country by reason of its new relations to foreign territory.

However much the necessity for a larger standing army may have been increased, or may yet be increased by reason of our foreign relations, the proposition for an augmentation of our national forces was thoroughly well founded, as evidenced by the situation which existed prior to the beginning of the recent war. As a simple business proposition it was entirely defensible on the 1st day of January, 1898. There had been no increase of the Regular Army since 1878. Since that time the United States has greatly increased in population.

Its interests have multiplied and developed at an enormous rate. The necessity for national defense, for the preservation and protection of property, for security against internal disorders of various kinds, was perhaps only apparent to those who had fully realized the tremendous growth of the country and of its business interests and commercial projects, and by those who had considered the great necessity and wisdom of more extended coast defenses, fortifications, and permanent improvements in that line. The fact is that not many realize the rate at which our country grows and the rate at which the world is traveling. Time is so noiseless that it awakens very, very few.

I have sometimes thought that the Rip Van Winkles are as numerous as the Smiths and Browns and Joneses. Of course, to those who are opposed to growth there is little use of talking about enterprise. There were thousands of people in the country willing to sleep in the back pews while wisdom and patriotism were urging the necessity of a larger navy, and there were even those who, apparently awake, contended with much noise against the evolution of an American sea power. It is not necessary to compliment the men who had the foresight to advocate and to accomplish the development of our sea power. The world has already witnessed, and history verifies their wisdom.

Since 1792, when the number of enlisted men in the Regular Army of the United States was 5,120, it had been gradually increased until 1878, when the number was 25,000, and which number had been maintained until 1898, when, by reason of the war, the number of enlisted men by authorization of law reached 63,106. The maximum number of enlisted men in the Regular Army of the United States authorized by law is 25,000, being one soldier for 2,488,890 inhabitants. I shall print, with the consent of the House, some tables showing the population of the different countries in the world, their area in square miles, their armies on a war footing, the number of inhabitants to each soldier, the number of soldiers to every thousand inhabitants, the number of soldiers per 10 square miles in time of peace, and the number of soldiers per 10 square miles in time of war; that is, the number of soldiers authorized by existing law.

It will not be contended for a moment that the situation in the United States requires as large a standing army as in other countries, but we do contend that reasonable foresight and prudence would authorize a sufficient standing army to protect our interests and properties, to preserve our institutions, to maintain peace and order, and to protect the liberties of our citizens.

I think it can be demonstrated to any reasonable mind that the standing army of the United States during the past two decades, while most efficient in quality, has been insufficient in numbers to serve the needs of our country.

However much the human mind must long for a peaceful adjustment of all difficulties and contentions, it is the demonstrated fact of history, not only in our own country but in all others, that force must be employed, not only in contending with savages and those who are semicivilized, but in dealing with civilized men who are disposed to be disorderly. The time may come, and I hope it will, when force shall not be the final arbiter in our worldly affairs; but until that time and coveted condition comes prudence and foresight must be exercised in order that the better day may not be further removed by reason of default in preparation, shortsightedness, and pretended economy. Let the history of our own country during the past few years bear witness to these propositions and to the continuous need which has existed for a larger standing army.

In the campaign against the Sioux Indians in 1876, in which over 4,000 troops were engaged, many of them came from distant points in Louisiana, Mississippi, New York, Montana, Missouri, Dakota, and Nebraska. The cost of transportation of the campaign has not been separately shown, but must have been very large, as the transportation expense for the year 1876 was over $3,600,000.

During the Pennsylvania riots in 1877 the number of troops sent to the scene of disturbance amounted to 2,600 officers and men. They were sent from Maine, Massachusetts, Rhode Island, Connecticut, New York, Pennsylvania, Maryland, District of Columbia, Virginia, North Carolina, South Carolina, Georgia, Florida, Alabama, Mississippi, Louisiana, Arkansas, Ohio, Michigan, and Missouri, and the cost of transportation was $73,081.86.

During the Pine Ridge disturbances in South Dakota in December, 1890, there were sent 6,400 officers and men, gathered from posts in California, Dakota, Montana, Nebraska, Texas, Illinois, and Missouri, and the cost of transportation was $543,324—more than half a million dollars.

The number of troops sent to Chicago during the riots in 1894, in addition to those stationed at Fort Sheridan, were approximately 1,300. They came from Fort Riley, Kans.; Fort Niobrara, Nebr.; Fort Leavenworth, Kans.; Fort Brady, Mich., and Madison Barracks, N. Y., and the cost of transportation alone was $221,985.35.

It will be observed that in three of these campaigns, or simple expeditions, within recent years, the cost of transportation alone was $838,391.21; and with the transportation expenses for the expedition first mentioned, which have not been separately ascertained, the total cost of transportation for the four expeditions can safely be estimated at a million and a quarter of dollars; and if the cost of transportation for other years has been as great as for the year 1876, $3,600,000, it is an easy matter to estimate the great saving in actual expense which might have been made with a sufficient standing army, that could have been distributed throughout the country so as to avoid the necessity of moving them across the continent.

The spectacle of a great country being obliged to transport its troops from one end of a great continent to the other in order to suppress a riot or to check the murderous hands of savages is certainly ludicrous, to say the least. It was said by a Spanish newspaper during the late war, in supposed ridicule of our country, that the United States had but few soldiers, mostly located in the Western portion, and in order to transport them to the Atlantic seaboard they had to be taken over one railroad, on which was located a dangerous bridge over Niagara Falls, which was liable to give way at any time. But the ridicule of the Spanish journalist barely outdoes the tremendous satire of actual facts which have for many years existed by reason of the failure to suitably prepare for the national defense and for the protection of American citizens and properties and individual rights.

Thanks to the wisdom of recent legislation, improvements have been already set on foot for a better national defense. With the consent of the House, and for the information of the country, I shall print a table showing the artillery force needed to furnish one relief for the guns of the coast armament actually installed June 30, 1899 (Exhibit A); and following that a table showing the artillery force required to man the proposed armament of the United States (Exhibit B).

*The data in my possession gives 35 R. F. guns for this harbor without stating number of large and small or distribution. I have added 3 companies to those necessary for the B. L. guns.

It may be admitted that the Regular Army is the manifestation of Federal authority; and here we come at once to the milk in the cocoanut of opposition to this bill. Any articulation of the national spirit is regarded by some people as the voice of tyranny; but if a patriotic manifestation of Federal authority or assertion of the national spirit is a threat at personal liberty and a menace to our institutions, then the very existence of the national spirit must be an inherent evil. If there is still remaining in the public mind a latent jealousy of Federal authority and an unexpired hatred of Uncle Sam, of course it would be expected to manifest itself against a proposition to increase the Regular Army, however great the need and however reasonable the process.

I have not failed to observe the prominence which has been given to this apparent fundamental idea of the opposition, as expressed in the views of the minority. Although occupying less than two pages of the report, the views of the minority glisten in at least four different places with general expressions indicating their tremendous anxiety about the liberty of the citizen; in fact, that idea seems to be the burden of their customary song of negation and pessimism. The country is to be enlightened in the very beginning of the views of the minority with a declaration that "such a standing army as the one proposed by the Hull bill would, in time of peace, be a menace to the liberty of the citizen."

Then resting a few moments from the fatigue of this burning announcement, and juggling momentarily with some figures relating to imagined expense, the minority rounds up again on the same page with a repetition of their unparalleled regard for the liberty of the people in these words:

> A President dominated by such interests would have, with such a standing army as is now proposed, the means at his hand to invade the liberties of the people, to suppress freedom of speech, and to desecrate the ballot box itself.

This ballot-box suggestion, it will be observed, breaks off their somewhat attenuated oration on the subject of personal liberty with a suddenness that almost gives it prominence, and makes one involuntarily wonder who has been desecrating ballot boxes.

But not being entirely sure that they have made it clear to the world that they intended to raise the question of liberty, they devote the next paragraph to that subject in a fashion which makes one believe that they are reaching a climax. It is in the nature of a warning, and tells us that this policy "launches the country upon a course which can only terminate in the destruction of the liberties of the people." And last of all, to round out their redundant report and to perfect their views with a ripeness and novelty of expression, so that it will be sure to catch the ear of every yearning and impressible citizen and not fail to enlighten the world on the subject of liberty, and that their fundamental argument may not be lost sight of, they tell us that they have prepared a substitute "embodying every need of the Government in its present condition and at the same time preserving with scrupulous care the liberty of the citizen."

I have not lived long enough to have learned of anything in the history of the exploits of American soldiery, or of their service, to justify that suspicion which is cast upon the institution known as the Regular Army of the United States, by the imputation that it could ever be used as a menace to the liberties of American citizenship. The service and the sacrifices of the Regular Army of our country is involved in just an even hundred events—wars, campaigns, expeditions, and military movements. (See Exhibit C.)

Does the history of valor and of glory in the Revolution prompt the gentlemen of the minority and of the opposition to warn America against American soldiery? Does the record of the regulars led by General Jackson at New Orleans fill the hearts of gentlemen with fear or apprehension for the safety of our citizens? Does Chapultepec send warning even unto modern Washington? Did there ever issue from the lips now closed in everlasting love and fame in that silent mausoleum by the Hudson any word of menace to a future citizen, any thought save peace, any oracle save liberty and union? God spare a grateful country and an admiring world from any doubt about the matchless magnanimity of Appomattox!

The lonely graves of "regulars" dot the Western plains, unlettered and obscure. Can it be possible that in those sepulchers of silence gentlemen hear echoes of dead voices menacing our liberties? Shall any thought of tyranny be attributed to Forsyth and his 50 gallant followers in that famous conflict with the Sioux? Would a standing army of 70,000,000 men like Captain Gunnison menance anything save barbarism or fail in their protection of great and noble enterprise?

Perhaps it is to Colonel Fetterman, with that famous detachment of the Eighteenth United States Infantry and the Second United States Cavalry, who were guilty of nothing save being massacred in the "Fatal Valley," near Fort Phil. Kearney, that gentlemen mean to impute a tendency to usurpation of the liberty of citizens. Or maybe they mean Lieutenant Grattan and his detachment of the Sixth United States Infantry, murdered in the "Mantrap," near Fort Laramie, Wyo., in 1854. It could not be General Canby and the famous heroes of the Modoc war in the awful lava beds. Perhaps in the peerless Custer and his annihilated followers this anxious and solicitous minority read some sign of usurpation, which makes them fear that future regulars, inspired by their illustrious example, might encroach upon our civil liberty.

But, after all, it may be that not until the cool and desperate charge at San Juan Hill, through murky river water up to the waistband, then through the terrible entanglements of barbed wire woven in the brush land, then up the hill to death and victory, did these gentlemen of the opposition feel so keenly the threatening danger of our regulars to the liberty of our citizens! Or, maybe, not in word or deed of soldiers, regular or volunteered, have they foreseen the tendency which they say can only terminate in the destruction of the liberties of the people. Perhaps it is in the apprehension that the people can not safely trust themselves in the selection of a Chief Executive, and that at some time the people's President may move the Army to some ignoble purpose and enslave the people who have chosen him and destroy their liberties and their institutions. Which will the country believe in the face of history, that the Regular Army is likely to destroy our liberties or that the people can not trust themselves in the selection of a Chief Executive?

For one State of the Union I answer we shall believe neither. A State which has for its motto, "Our liberties we prize, and our rights we will maintain," has neither fear of military menace, Federal authority, nor inherent weakness in our national system of self-government. Our citizens, whose ideas of personal liberty are founded in reason, are not jealous of the power which is the safeguard of that liberty. Uncle Sam has no terror for a Hawkeye. He is always a venerated and respected and a welcome guest. Nobody ever heard of anyone who was trying to serve the Lord and his country being interfered with by the Regular Army or by Federal authority. All the symbols and tokens and manifestations and personifications of the national spirit are welcome in the State of Iowa and, as I verily believe, to all law-abiding citizens.

Men are sometimes overtaken by their own shadows, but if they are willing to face their own intentions, they make no outcry. The State of Iowa holds in reverent respect the patriotic valor of the American Army, and doubting not our system of self-government, but believing in the ability and good intentions of a righteous President, will not discredit either by a single vote to cripple the power which is the conservator of peace, of property, of law and order, and of individual rights and human liberty.

Whatever number may be finally determined upon as a reasonable increase for the Army in view of all existing conditions and necessities, it will be found that much time—perhaps many years—will be required to recruit that number. For, as pointed out by Adjutant-General Corbin in a straightforward and sensible article in the January number of the Forum, the personnel and the morale of the Army are constantly being improved and the recruit of recent years has been required to meet severer tests than formerly. I quote from that most excellent discussion of General Corbin this sentence:

As the years have gone by the gantlet which the applicants have been forced to run has been made more and more severe, until last year only about 3 men were accepted to every 10 rejected; or, to be exact, while 29,521 recruits were obtained, 98,277 applicants were rejected as lacking in legal, mental, moral, or physical requirements.

In view of these facts, that our need for a larger standing army is constantly increasing and that owing to the excellent grade that is and should be required in recruiting, much time will be required to fill the ranks that may be authorized, it appears to me that there should be no delay in making the authorization for an increased national defense.

When I contemplate the peerless services, the modest bravery, and the unselfish devotion of the American "regular" to the country's interests and to the public welfare, when I consider the wondrous character and manhood that have been evidenced in all ranks of the Regular Army, and in services which they have so patriotically rendered with the simple inspiration of their thought of duty, I feel a certain sense of safety and security in their presence and in their guardianship of public institutions and of law and order, which makes me glad to have the opportunity to supply their needs and to augment their forces, and there are so many instances in the history of their matchless sacrifices and incomparable courage that I can not withhold an expression of gratitude on my own account and on behalf of the industrious, law-abiding, loyal people for whom I have the great honor to speak in this assembly.

In all the years of toil and strife and victory that make the history of our Republic great the Regular Army has been its shield and buckler. Whether on desert plain, in lava beds, or forest jungle, contending with the cunning, cruel savages, or on the open battlefield in bloody strife with peers, or facing mad men in the terrible delirium of anarchistic riots and rebellion, the "regular" has been the same unswerving, dauntless bearer and defender of the flag. Whether rationed well and plentifully fed, or surviving on mule meat till succor came from distant post, aroused by faithful messengers, the Stars and Stripes have kept his eye with sleepless vigilance awake to duty and to deeds of daring. Pittance paid and plainly fed, he falters not and never complains.

Living at the lonely frontier post year in, year out, trusted emissary of his Uncle Sam, protector of the pioneer, shortening the uneventful hours with games of pitch or jesting with his comrades, opening with anxious haste belated letters brought by courier or stagecoach telling him of happenings at home, of life and love, of births and deaths and orange blossoms, of failure and ambition and success, of opportunity in civil life, and just there, caught in the middle of a sigh by signal taps, he straightens up, a soldier still, a soldier every inch of him, ready for his duty in any hour of day or night.

Whether he hails from Southern clime or Northern shore, from classic East or hardy Westland, the spirit of his country enters and possesses him, and he becomes a comrade and a patriot, faithful always, always unto death. Wherever he lives, we honor him: wherever he sleeps, we mourn, and whenever he comes to judgment the record will say: Thou faithful servant of the Most High God.

Mr. HULL. I now ask the gentleman from New York [Mr. SULZER] to use the remainder of his time.

Mr. SULZER. Mr. Chairman, how much time have we on our side?

The CHAIRMAN. Eighteen minutes.

Mr. SULZER. How much time have gentlemen on the other side?

The CHAIRMAN. Nine minutes.

Mr. SULZER. I yield the balance of our time to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. FITZGERALD].

[Mr. FITZGERALD addressed the committee. See Appendix.]

Mr. HULL. Mr. Chairman, I yield three minutes to my colleague on the committee [Mr. MARSH].

Mr. MARSH. Mr. Chairman, in the remarks I submitted to the House yesterday, I stated that at the proper time I should offer an amendment reducing the number of men in a company of infantry from 145 to 106. For reasons satisfactory to myself, I now give notice to the House that I will not offer that amendment.

I also stated in my remarks that at the proper time I would offer an amendment that appointment and promotion to the staff hereafter should be by detail from the line of the Army. I now give notice to the House, for reasons satisfactory to myself, that I will not offer that amendment.

I stated to the House further that at the proper time I would offer an amendment to this bill leaving it discretionary with the President as to whether he would enlist up to the full limit, men and officers, or not, and I now give notice I will offer an amendment or amendments which leave the minimum of the Army, so far as the infantry, cavalry, and artillery are concerned, at 50,000, and the maximum as provided for in this bill. And at the proper time I will submit amendments appropriately reducing the number of staff officers provided for in this bill.

Having announced yesterday that I would offer these amendments, I thought that I was in duty bound to notify the House that I had concluded, for satisfactory reasons to myself, not to offer them.

Mr. HULL. Mr. Chairman, before submitting any papers in regard to the number of men believed to be necessary at this time I want to say that I think the Republicans on the Committee on Military Affairs are absolutely unanimous in supporting an amendment fixing the minimum of the Army so that it will meet all the criticisms we have heard of the bill from those who are in favor of a reputable army to enforce the mandates of the nation.

As to the number of men required at this time, I want to say that the Committee on Military Affairs has not taken its own views nor the views of members of Congress, but has taken the authoritative expression of men on the ground, who state the number necessary in order to preserve peace, maintain law, and maintain the supremacy of the United States.

These men know members of Congress can only guess. There was a commission appointed to arrange for the evacuation of Cuba by the Spanish forces, consisting of Major-General Wade, Major-General Butler, and Admiral Sampson, and I hold in my hand their report, or a copy of it, in which they say that 50,000 men are necessary, not possibly to enforce order, but to absolutely insure that there will be no bloodshed and that there will be law and order there. While a smaller number may perform the duty assigned to them, yet a smaller number is liable to encounter looting and bloodshed and rioting, and the consideration of prudence is to have enough to insure peace and tranquillity in the island. We all know how it is in Manila.

The general in command there thirty days ago cabled that 20,000 men would be enough. Within the last month the number has been gradually increasing until to-day the United States Government is sending to the islands of the Philippines at least 30,000 men to maintain our authority there. The very fact that we had a small force, coupled with the fact that the inhabitants of those islands have been led to believe the people of the United States are divided and would turn down the Administration, has multiplied the dangers in the islands of the Pacific until no man can know how many men it will take before we are through with it to maintain the authority of the United States.

I do not propose, Mr. Chairman, in the few minutes I have, to discuss expansion. We have our flag planted in the Philippines, we have the territory ceded to us by the only Government heretofore exercising sovereignty over it, and until the Congress of the United States determines what shall be done there it is the part of patriotism to maintain our authority so that we may preserve the respect of the nations of the world.

Mr. Chairman, to my mind, it is absolutely important that in fixing the maximum for this army we should at least listen to the men who are on the ground, who know the situation, and who can tell us facts and not make a mere guess as to what is needed there. If we do this, the maximum of 100,000 will not be disturbed.

Now, Mr. Chairman, it seems to me that by preserving the flexibility which the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois will preserve, leaving to the President of the United States a discretion to make an increase of the Army ranging from 50,000 as a minimum to 100,000 men as a maximum, we shall have accomplished what those who are afraid of a large army have desired. We shall have put in the hands of the Executive the discretion and power and duty of increasing the Army only to the extent necessary to maintain the authority of the United States and preserve peace.

And, Mr. Chairman, we must trust somebody. Gentlemen here are afraid to trust the next Congress. They are afraid to legislate with the understanding that when the crisis passes, when we reach the point that we do not need these additional men, Congress can cut down the number. We die as a Congress on the 4th of March next. We must place in the hands of some one the power to protect the interests of the United States and maintain the authority of the law. We have got to do that; and I believe every man on this floor has an abiding faith that the present occupant of the White House—I will except the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. JOHNSON], but every other man, I believe——

Mr. DOCKERY. I will remind the gentleman from Iowa that the gentleman from Indiana is not here.

Mr. HULL. But he will read my remarks in the RECORD. He always knows what is going on. I say there is this abiding faith that the President of the United States will not violate or abuse this trust. There has never been a time in the history of our Republic when all parties have united in paying tribute to the patriotism and ability and honesty and purity of motive of any President to the extent that has been witnessed in the United States during this past summer in the case of the present Chief Executive of this country. He has not prosecuted the war on a partisan basis. He has been broad enough to take in the whole country and all factions. He has been broad enough to recognize every section and every faction of this country, and he has won the plaudits which the people of the United States are glad to bestow on a broad-minded, conservative, patriotic President of the United States.

And, gentlemen, he will have no object in increasing the Army beyond what is necessary. He will have the discretion, and it will be his duty to pass upon the question. And that being true, I believe I can appeal at least to this side of the House, by a solid, unanimous vote, to place in his hands the power to maintain the sovereignty of the United States wherever the Army or the Navy has carried it; wherever it has been granted to us by treaty; until the Congress of the United States itself shall determine what shall be the future policy of the United States Government. [Loud applause.]

Mr. Chairman, I shall take the liberty of adding to my remarks in the RECORD the report of the commissioners on the situation.

WAR DEPARTMENT, ADJUTANT-GENERAL'S OFFICE,
Washington, December 14, 1898.

SIR: Agreeable to your request of this date, while I was before the House Committee on Military Affairs, I have the honor to transmit herewith letter from Major-General Wade, chairman of the Commission of Evacuation, giving recommendation of that commission for the number of troops necessary to garrison the island of Cuba.

Very respectfully,
H. C. CORBIN,
Adjutant-General.

Hon. J. A. T. HULL,
Chairman Military Committee, House of Representatives,
Washington, D. C.

U. S. COMMISSION FOR EVACUATION OF ISLAND OF CUBA, Havana, October 19, 1898.

SIR: As directed by your cable of the 14th instant, I have the honor to furnish herewith a table showing my recommendation as to the stations for United States troops, with number and kind of troops at each, upon evacuation by Spain. The Spanish troops now occupy 52 garrisons, counting Havana and other cities as one station each. It will be neither practicable or advisable to replace all these garrisons. My recommendation is based upon holding the more important cities, seaports, and railroad centers, with sufficient force to operate in the vicinity and furnish small garrisons at such other points as may become necessary. This I believe to be the best disposition to make of troops when they arrive. Should this be approved, the troops for each station should be promptly furnished when asked for by the evacuation commission, so as to be at their stations in time to relieve the Spanish garrisons and prevent occupation by insurgent troops now concentrated near most of the designated places.

I consider the number of troops named in the accompanying table as the smallest that should be in the island not including those now in the Department of Santiago. In fixing this number I have been governed by the following considerations: Cuba is, and for a long time has been, really a military camp and governed by the most arbitrary rules, practically there is no civil government or authority. The Spanish force consists of about 118,000 regulars, 21,000 volunteers on duty, and 52,000 volunteers, armed, but not on duty. The insurgents claim to have about 40,000 armed men, making a total of 231,000. Probably the military evacuation by Spain will remove about 100,000 men, leaving considerably more than that number who will be, or recently have been, under arms and to a great extent living off the country. Many of these men will, from necessity if not from choice, be without employment. Among these men, as well as those who have not taken part in the late Spanish-Cuban war, exist race feuds and political factions. Many of the people are very ignorant, few understand what independence and liberty mean, or have fixed ideas as to what the future of their country will or should be. It will require tact and force to harmonize the conflicting interests and insure order. If a large force occupies the island as soon as Spain evacuates, it can under favorable conditions be much reduced in a few months, but it would be unfortunate to begin with too small a force and be obliged to increase it.

Very respectfully,
J. F. WADE,
Major-General, Volunteers.

The CHAIRMAN. The time allowed for general debate has expired. The Clerk will proceed to read the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That from and after the date of approval of this act the Army of the United States shall consist of 1 Lieutenant-General, 6 major-generals, 12 brigadier-generals, 12 regiments of cavalry, a corps of artillery, 30 regiments of infantry, an Adjutant-General's Department, an Inspector-General's Department, a Judge-Advocate-General's Department, a Quartermaster's Department, a Subsistence Department, a Medical Department, a Pay Department, a Corps of Engineers, an Ordnance Department, a Signal Corps, 30 post chaplains, the Chief of the Record and Pension Office, the officers of the Army on the retired list, the professors, corps of cadets, an army-service detachment, and band at the United States Military Academy, and such other officers and enlisted men as may hereinafter be provided for.

The following amendment, reported by the Committee on Military Affairs, was read:

In lines 11 and 12 of section 1, strike out the words "thirty post" and insert the word "forty;" so as to read "forty chaplains."

Several members rose.

The CHAIRMAN. The first amendment in order is this amendment offered by the committee.

Mr. DOCKERY. But outside amendments, if offered, may influence the judgment of the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. HULL. Committee amendments come first in order.

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment of the committee is, of course, subject to amendment.

Mr. SHAFROTH. But this amendment is subject to debate.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will recognize the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. SHAFROTH].

[Mr. SHAFROTH addressed the committee. See Appendix.]

Mr. HULL. I hope we may have a vote on the committee amendment now.

Mr. BRUCKER. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. DOCKERY. Mr. Chairman, I want to offer a substantial amendment to this paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will recognize the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. BRUCKER].

[Mr. BRUCKER addressed the committee. See Appendix.]

Mr. DOCKERY. I desire to offer an amendment to the text of the committee amendment.

Mr. HAY. A parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri desires to offer an amendment to the amendment.

Mr. HAY. A parliamentary inquiry. Can any amendment be offered until the committee amendments are disposed of?

The CHAIRMAN. Not if the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs should choose to offer the amendments.

Mr. HULL. The amendments are offered.

The CHAIRMAN. If he should yield, of course other members can offer amendments.

Mr. DOCKERY. I desire to offer an amendment, unless some member of the committee should desire to offer it.

Mr. HULL. Do I understand the gentleman from Missouri to offer an amendment to the amendment?

Mr. DOCKERY. I desire to offer an amendment to the text.

Mr. HULL. I object to that.

The CHAIRMAN. It is not in order until the committee amendments are disposed of.

Mr. HULL. I ask for a vote.

Mr. DOCKERY. Let us have a separate vote on the amendments. There is an increase of 10 chaplains; I should like to hear an explanation.

Mr. HULL. Yes, sir; I will say to the gentleman——

Mr. HOPKINS. I trust the gentleman from Missouri will not object to additional chaplains.

Mr. DOCKERY. Why, I am not objecting, but simply inquire the necessity for the increase.

Mr. HOPKINS. The gentleman certainly believes that the soldiers should have the benefit of religious instruction and consolation as well as civilians.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Each one will need a preacher if he goes there and stays long.

Mr. DOCKERY. I suspect the gentleman from Iowa is more familiar with the question than the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HOPKINS]. [Laughter.]

Mr. HULL. I call for a vote.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the first committee amendment.

The question was taken; and the Chairman announced that the ayes seemed to have it.

Mr. STEELE. Let us have a division.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 60, noes 24.

So the amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the next amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

In line 12, after the word "chaplains," insert "to be assigned to regiments or posts in the discretion of the Secretary of War;" strike out the words "chief of the" and insert "a."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. DOCKERY. Now, Mr. Chairman——

Mr. HULL. There is another committee amendment.

Mr. HAY. I offer the following amendment to the text.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa states that there is another amendment suggested by the committee.

Mr. HAY. That is all of them.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk states to the Chair that all the amendments have been read and adopted.

Mr. HULL. The first amendment was, to strike out "thirty posts" and insert "forty." That carried. The next was, "to be assigned to regiments or posts in the discretion of the Secretary of War;" and that carried. The next is, to strike out "chief of the" and insert "a;" so that it will read "Record and Pension Division." That has not been submitted.

Mr. DOCKERY. The Clerk read it.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk read it as one amendment.

Mr. HAY. Now, Mr. Chairman, I offer this amendment, to come in at the end of the section.

The Clerk read as follows:

Provided, That the increase of the Regular Army provided for in this bill over what it was before the war with Spain shall only be used in Porto Rico, Cuba, the Philippine Islands, the Hawaiian Islands, and the Ladrone Islands: And provided further, That said increase of both officers and men shall be mustered out of the service of the United States within two years of the passage of this act, or sooner, if the exigencies of the public service permit.

Mr. HAY. Now, Mr. Chairman, I offer this amendment in line of the suggestion of the gentleman from Iowa, who has abandoned by his statement on this floor the bill which he has brought into this House. It seems that there can only be used, by the admission of the gentleman, 50,000 men, but the President is to be given discretion by this Congress to increase the Army up to 100,000 men.

I agree with the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. BRUCKER] that no matter how good or how great a man may be, such power as is proposed to be conferred upon him by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HULL] ought not to be conferred. Now, the amendment which I have proposed is practically an amendment which provides for the volunteer forces to be used only in the islands and to be used in accordance with what the General of the Army says will be necessary for those islands.

I do not believe that the 100,000 men can be used in this country and the islands put together; however, recognizing the character of the temporary conditions which exist between this country and the islands, which we have not as yet acquired, I am willing to provide for some temporary force to meet the conditions which the Executive says now confront us.

I am not willing to go one step beyond that, but I am not willing to admit that we need any more men in the Regular Army in this country than we needed before the war with Spain. I am not willing to admit or to believe that in two years from this time it will be necessary to have a man in the island of Cuba or in the Philippine Islands. I am not willing to believe that the Congress of the United States will inaugurate a policy which will result in continual warfare with the people of the Philippine Islands.

To-day we are informed that a conflict has occurred between the army of this country and the people in the Philippine Islands. If we continue by passing measures of this sort, which can only be excused from the standpoint that we are going to take forcible possession of the Philippine Islands, then we may expect within thirty days to be at war with the people of the Philippines, with a people that we say ought to have their liberty and that some gentlemen on the other side say the President intends to give liberty.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Notably the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HEPBURN].

Mr. HAY. Notably the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HEPBURN]. Now, it does seem to me that it is our duty to the people of this country to protect our own interests and our own liberties before we undertake to give liberty to other people. To give it to them by sending them a large army, a force of 30,000 or 40,000 men, to shoot and kill them if they do not come up with the requirements which we may prescribe, is, in my judgment, a very poor way to bestow liberty on any people.

Therefore it is that I offer this amendment for the purpose of having only a temporary force and one that will not be at the discretion of the President.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. HULL. Mr. Chairman, I sincerely hope this amendment will not be adopted. It is a part of the minority report to provide a temporary force. It will simply, as I believe, result in defeating all the purposes of increasing the force of the United States Army. We know that the volunteers we have to-day, while they were anxious to get into the Army, are equally anxious to get out, and we want to legislate so they can get out as soon as possible. I do not believe it would be possible to organize an army of occupation for two years only on the plan that this amendment provides it shall do, for this does not extend beyond two years. In other words, it is trying to make something that is temporary in its nature answer where a general permanent law will answer better. A general law will save money to the United States and will not tie the hands of the Government as to what shall be its policy when two years from this time shall roll around.

As I said in the beginning, with things as they are now, and with the amendment that will be offered by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MARSH], it will put in the hands of the President ample discretion. There is no need of putting a larger army in the field than is absolutely necessary. It seems to me that to raise 50,000 men that must be kept all the time in the islands is mischievous. You have got to take the men away from the islands after a while, and you must have a reserve at home. You must exchange the men from the Temperate Zone with those in the Tropics. To provide 50,000 men to serve only in a tropical country would be almost murder. I do not believe a proposition of that kind should receive the vote of a single man on the floor of this House.

It seems to me that when we provide a flexible system, as has been suggested, it answers all the purposes necessary. Nobody knows who will be President three years from now. We believe that Mr. McKinley will be reelected. Some of you gentlemen on that side affect to believe that you will elect a man of your party. But no matter who he is, he will be the President of the United States, and I do not believe he will exercise his power to the injury of the people who have elected him to his high office. Now I will yield to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. COX] for a question.

Mr. COX. I would like to ask the gentleman, the chairman of the committee, what do you want of this army? [Laughter.] I did not intend to provoke any kind of merriment at all. But what I want to know is this: When you get your Regular Army recruited up to 100,000 men, what are you going to do with them?

Mr. HULL. Mr. Chairman, if we have an army of 100,000 under the bill as it will be changed, it will be because we absolutely need an army of 100,000. I will answer the question, What are we going to do with such an army? We are going to place them where the Chief Executive says they are necessary to enforce the laws and the sovereignty of the United States. And I want to say to my friend that in doing that with the Army we are doing what every nation on earth does with its physical power—maintaining its sovereignty and enforcing its laws. If the laws of the United States are not challenged—if our authority is not challenged—we will not need that army. But if the authority of the United States and our laws are challenged, we shall need physical force to bring respect to our flag.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Mr. Chairman, the closing sentence of the gentleman on the other side [Mr. HULL] was that we needed this army for the purpose of enforcing the laws and the sovereignty of the United States wherever they were disputed.

Mr. HULL. No; I did not say that. I did not say "wherever they were disputed," because we could not very well take that army to England and Germany and France.

Mr. GAINES. You would strike only the little fellows.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. The remark of the gentleman from Iowa is a mere quibble about words. Of course I did not understand the gentleman—who is my personal friend—as disclaiming what he now disclaims, as saying what he now disclaims. I do not think he had a right to understand my observation. What he meant was this—that we wanted this Army for the purpose of maintaining the laws and sovereignty of the United States in our allegedly newly acquired territories whenever our laws and sovereignty may be disputed.

Mr. HULL. I will stand by that.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Now, the laws and sovereignty of the United States extend nowhere except where the Constitution of the United States, the creator of the law and of the Government itself, extends. Gentlemen on the other side contend that the Constitution of the United States will not apply to newly acquired territory. But outside of all that, the point that I make here now is that the gentleman presupposes the taking and holding of the Philippine Islands—because at least thirty or forty thousand of these troops are to be sent to those islands, according to the universal consensus of opinion upon both sides.

Now, Mr. Chairman, how are the laws and the sovereignty of the United States to be enforced in the Philippine Islands? Purely by this title, if any—the title which we obtained from the Kingdom of Spain. She is our grantor, and we are her grantees. Up to a short while ago we were ourselves disputing the title of Spain in the Philippine Islands; and now we step in as the grantees of that title and undertake, as the Washington Post has done lately, to denounce as "rebels" against American law and sovereignty and authority a people who are doing nothing except what our own people did in the days of George III—asserting their rights to be free, and if it be necessary in order to be free, then their right to be independent.

Mr. Chairman, the gentleman objects to the observation of my friend from Virginia [Mr. HAY] that what he proposes to provide is simply a temporary force; and the gentleman's objection is substantially upon the ground that it is simply temporary. Then he must mean that he wants something permanent in its character. If the gentleman from Iowa is right, and if the Republican policy is to have a permanent standing army for the permanent occupation of the Philippine Islands, then in what sort of a condition is my friend from Iowa [Mr. DOLLIVER], who absolutely refused to answer the question put to him—absolutely refused to indorse what we have said was the Republican policy, namely, a permanent occupation of the Philippine Islands.

And in what sort of a condition must my other friend from Iowa [Mr. HEPBURN] be, when he has asserted upon the floor of this House that the Republican policy is to occupy the Philippine Islands only until stability of government can be obtained there and until anarchy among the people can be prevented?

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, in five minutes one can say but little; still I think that time will be sufficient for me to say what I desire.

Many things have followed the declaration of war with Spain. One is that Spain has gone out of Cuba; another is that she has gone out of Porto Rico; another is that our Army and Navy are over in the Philippines; another is that we have possession of one of the Ladrones. It does not make any difference whether we are fond of that condition of affairs or not. Those results have followed the war as a logical sequence, and we have got to deal with them. We may quarrel and excuse; we may support by words, and strike under the fifth rib, watching our opportunity, but the man or the party that fails to deal with the situation as it is does not do justice to himself or itself, and the rocks and the mountains will and ought to fall on him. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, we are in the Philippines. We are there under the war power, and will be there under the war power until the treaty is ratified. We have got a navy there; we have got a considerable portion of the Army there, and we are sending more. Gentlemen say, What are you going to do with the Philippines? In my judgment (and I act accordingly and from that standpoint) on the 6th day of February, or, at the furthest, by the 10th day of March next, the treaty with Spain will be ratified; and then we have got to deal with the Philippines. How? We will deal with them by the continuance of a military government there for the present. That is what there is there now, and that is what it will continue, just as it continued in California after we acquired it as a portion of our national territory.

A MEMBER. Just as it did in Louisiana.

Mr. CANNON. Yes; just as it did in Louisiana.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Will the gentleman allow me?

Mr. CANNON. I can not yield in five minutes. If I had a little more time, I should be glad to do so.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Let me ask the gentleman a question——

Mr. CANNON. Now, my friend knows that I can not yield in five minutes. I would with a great deal of pleasure if I had time. I will hereafter, no doubt, have an opportunity to answer any question that my friend may desire to ask.

But, Mr. Chairman, let me continue. If we proceed in our policy, we must have an army sufficient to enforce the laws, and also to enforce order and respect for the flag of the country, at least during our temporary occupation of these outlying countries, for the purpose of protecting our own people, and, in fact, to protect all other people there who may need our protection.

It is vain and futile to say what will be done with the Philippine Islands. Who knows? I do not know and you do not know. Who can tell what the result will be? After the ratification of the treaty we will have a question presented with which the Congress of the United States is strong enough and able enough to deal; but in the meantime we must hold them under military control until Congress, in its wisdom and in its patriotism, shall determine what our course is to be. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Now, Mr. Chairman, for these reasons, as the Army goes down to 25,000 men under the law, as it is at present, the moment that treaty of peace is ratified—for that reason I say I am for the pending bill.

What is the pending bill? It is a proposition simply to increase the Regular Army of the United States—after it is amended, as it will be amended under the lead of my distinguished colleague from Illinois—to 50,000 as a minimum, which may be enlarged, in the light of the necessities that may arise and in the discretion of the President, from 50,000 to 100,000 men. That will be done in case of necessity. That is all there is of it.

"Too much power," somebody says, "in the hands of the President." Why, Mr. Chairman, the President is chosen every four years by the people of this country.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. HULL. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Illinois have five minutes' additional time.

There was no objection.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. COX. I desire to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. I want to interrupt the gentleman——

Mr. CANNON. Now, I trust my friends will permit me to proceed for the short time I shall occupy the attention of the House. There are certain things I want to say. I will be on the floor again, and I will seek to yield to the gentleman from Mississippi for any inquiry he may wish to propound.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Of course, I do not desire to be discourteous to the gentleman, and will desist from my effort to ask him a question in connection with what he has said.

Mr. COX. I wish to ask the gentleman from Illinois——

Mr. CANNON. I can not yield at present. In all courteousness, I must say to my friend from Tennessee that I can not submit to any inquiry at this time.

Mr. COX. Very well; I will take another opportunity.

Mr. CANNON. The President of the United States is selected once in every four years. If he violates the law of the country, he is subject to impeachment; and also there is a remedy, stronger even than that, I believe, in the minds of the people. If he violates the Constitution and the laws, he is subject to the discipline of a wise and patriotic public sentiment. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Gentlemen say that a standing army is a menace to the liberties of the people, when they know, as a matter of fact, that its life is dependent altogether upon the action of Congress, upon appropriations for its support, for its transportation, and all of the necessities of an army, all of these questions to be determined by a vote of the Congress chosen every two years by the people of the country, and coming, it may be, with instructions from them as to their will upon any important question.

There is no danger, Mr. Chairman, whatever, in the proposition which presents itself to us for consideration to-day. There is no danger with the 75,000,000 of our kindred—of our own people—the people of this country, whose liberties are in their own hands—there is no danger that these liberties will be subverted by a standing army of 50,000 men, to be increased to 100,000 in the discretion of the President if occasion shall demand such an increase. This army is to be recruited from our own citizens. It is composed of our own people. There is no trouble or danger from that source. I do not know that anything can convince gentlemen on that side of the House. It is your province to be critical. Your function is criticism and opposition.

You are in the minority. Our function—we being in the majority—is to legislate. We are responsible to the people and to the country. And I want to say to the House and those who listen to me that we dare not shirk that responsibility. [Applause on the Republican side.] And further, Mr. Chairman, in the present condition and in our present troubles, we dare not go at a snail's pace or resort to halfway measures. We have a duty which is set to us and which we can not shirk. It is our duty to "pluck the flower safety from the nettle danger."

When questions of this character arise, demanding the patriotic consideration of the members of this body, it is our duty to grasp the situation and to deal with it according to the dictates of common sense and common reason. [Applause.]

We are in that condition now. Is there a man here, even on that side of the House, save one, who would call back the Army and the Navy of the United States from the Philippine Islands if he had the power to do so? [Applause on Republican side.] There is one, at least, who says that he would do so. But if he says that the majority of this body would be willing to do such a thing, then, Mr. Chairman, he is "talking through his hat." There is no one on this side of the House who will assume such a position as that. [Applause on Republican side.] And if we fail to give honest government, safety and security of property, and personal liberty to these people, as is our duty, in the Philippine Islands, and disaster comes, rocks and mountains will fall upon us, and every man on the other side of the House will be heaving rocks upon us and on our heads over the precipice. [Applause on Republican side.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, it is always delightful to listen to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON], for, while he usually states only part of the facts pertaining to the matter in hand, he states them with great emphasis, seemingly impressed with the notion that thus he may dispense with the necessity of stating all the facts. [Laughter.] He says we will continue to hold the Philippine Islands. May I inquire, what portion of the Philippine Islands do we now hold? We hold a single city. How did we obtain possession of that city?

Mr. TAWNEY. By the guns of Admiral Dewey.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. We obtained it by securing as allies the army commanded by Aguinaldo, the present chief executive of the republic of the Philippines. We placed arms in the hands of an army of natives, and this army, which took the field with the avowed purpose of winning liberty and independence, assisted in capturing the only Philippine territory now occupied by our forces.

Contemporaneous with Dewey's investment of Manila by sea, it was invested by land by the army under command of Aguinaldo. Indisputably, Aguinaldo went to the island and organized and placed this army in the field at the request of the authorized representatives of the United States. We know that upon landing there he issued a proclamation declaring that he appeared as the liberator of his country, and that in response to this appeal his countrymen flocked to his standard by thousands.

The American people know—the world knows—that it was for the liberation of their fatherland, and not with the expectation that they were to merely change masters, that the Filipinos took up arms. The President of the United States is aware, and at every stage of the pending discussion has been aware, that before a blow was struck by the followers of Aguinaldo he proclaimed the independence of the islands. Knowing all this, we accepted his services.

And, Mr. Chairman, I call history to witness that the Philippine Islanders under the command of Aguinaldo have earned and deserve the respect and admiration of the world. Traversing a large area of Luzon, they drove the Spanish forces from the interior of the island, captured 5,000 prisoners, surrounded the capital, and confined the Spanish forces there within the intrenchments until the arrival of our army upon the scene.

Aguinaldo had placed himself and his army at the disposal of the American commander, and never was subaltern more loyal to his chief. When Dewey directed that Aguinaldo's forces should refrain from an assault upon Manila until the arrival of Merritt and his men, Aguinaldo was obedient. When the city was surrendered, Aguinaldo was requested to depart and leave the American forces in possession, and without complaint he yielded obedience.

This Filipino chief has evinced the profoundest reverence for our country and unquestioning faith in its good intentions. Is it possible that the American Congress would break faith with this man and his people? Can we draw the sword against the Philippines without dishonor? It has been said that we entered into no explicit engagement binding us to recognize Aguinaldo and his followers—that they have no standing entitling them to our consideration.

Undoubtedly by their achievements and deportment during the months preceding the fall of Manila they won the right to be treated as a belligerent power, and were so treated by the American commander. Are we to say that at Manila, while acting in conjunction with Dewey's fleet and under Dewey's orders, they were patriots and soldiers because they fought under the Stars and Stripes for the emancipation of their country, but that at Iloilo this same army became mere interlopers because, forsooth, they continued the struggle without our help? Why was not Aguinaldo and his followers denounced as mere rioters when they fought side by side with our forces at Manila?

Mr. Chairman, they were patriots then; they are patriots now. They took the field to establish the liberty and independence of their country, and who can blame them for still treasuring the hope of success?

Mr. Chairman, we are told that these people are incapable of self-government. A dozen of the ablest men in the convention which framed and adopted our Constitution said the same thing concerning the men who achieved American independence.

The soldiers of the Revolution were characterized as "the ribald democracy," and it was insisted that they should not participate directly in controlling this Government. Scores of times in the course of debates in the Constitutional Convention the demand was made that a constitution be formulated which would eliminate, as far as possible, the participation of the masses in the enactment of laws and their administration.

Mr. Chairman, this objection to democracy was not new then—it is not new now. It is the objection which has been made at every step in the world's struggle for emancipation from absolutism. How do we know that the Filipinos are incapable? We can at least give them a chance. Good faith requires it. The honor of the Republic is at stake as well as the maxims of free government.

Sir, let us remember that the oppressed people of the Philippines have followed our flag in battle and placed their future in our keeping with unalloyed confidence, and that all they now ask is adherence to promises, implied by acceptance of their loyal devotion. Speaking for myself and, I think, for this side of the House, I declare that nothing should tempt us to betray their confidence. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. Chairman, if we seize these islands by force, we must hold them by force. If we quarter an army of occupation in the Philippines, we do so with the distinct understanding that we must constantly maintain an army there and that the authority of this Government will not extend beyond the places thus occupied. Such has been the history of Spanish occupation.

Sir, 7,000 miles of ocean separate the Philippine Islands from this country, and while we, an alien race, may usurp authority there by force of arms, the extent of that authority will be measured by the numbers sent to vex the people and impose upon them an objectionable government. We may obtain lodgments upon the seacoast and hold numerous fortified places in the Philippines, but before entering upon such an enterprise we should bear in mind that our army of occupation must be transported 7,000 miles.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Ten.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. We are requested to pass this bill and then leave everything to the President; we are not to be permitted to inquire what the President intends to do. Gentlemen on the other side admit that they do not know what policy will be pursued by the Administration.

In the course of this discussion it has been said that we "must hold the Philippines," and I take it this must mean that no attention must be paid to the resistance of the natives. This must be what the President contemplates. If so, why does he not say so? The army provided for by this bill is to be sent to the Philippines, and the American Republic is to enforce its authority there by force of arms, just as Spain has for nearly three centuries.

Mr. Chairman, I protest against leaving in the hands of the Executive discretionary authority to levy war upon the Philippine Islanders, or to exercise any other constitutional function of the legislative branch of the Government. Are we prepared to abdicate the constitutional rights of this body? What are its constitutional functions, and what the functions of the President?

In grave junctures like this the Constitution provides that the President shall lay before Congress all the facts and his views concerning them, and that the people through their representatives, and not the Executive, shall deal with the question. The Constitution does not provide that the President shall say to Congress, "The country is on the eve of war. Give me an army of 100,000 men; then adjourn; and after I shall have performed according to my own sweet will until next December, Congress can assemble and determine what it wants done."

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. DOCKERY. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman's time be extended five minutes.

There was no objection.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. What may be expected to happen in the Philippines within the next six or seven months? War, inevitably. War with Spain? No; war with the natives—a war in which we will seek to force upon the islands a right to govern, bought for spot cash from Spain. This Republic is about to enforce the brutal doctrine that governments derive their just powers from the free use of the sword. It is about to declare that the right to govern 10,000,000 people may be sold by an oppressor who for three centuries has held sway by violence and practiced robbery as a privilege inherent in rulers holding power ostensibly by divine right.

To uphold this new and strange doctrine we are about to turn our arms against our late allies. We are going to make war upon a people who, in their pronunciamento in favor of the right to self-government, quoted the immortal language of our Declaration of Independence that all men possess the inalienable rights of life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness.

Mr. Chairman, that noble sentiment will never be eradicated from the American mind. The gentlemen who say "Hold the Philippines!" will never convince the American people that governments do not derive their just powers from the consent of the governed. The proposed war of conquest may find for a while champions and defenders, but when the sober second thought shall come, when the American people shall pass finally upon the rights of the Filipinos, they will accord to them the measure of human rights written by the founders of this Republic, and woe to the party that shall attempt to substitute for that measure the brutal maxims of the conqueror. Sir, the rocks and mountains, which according to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] are to fall upon those responsible for mistakes in this matter, will not fall upon opponents of the present policy of the Republican side of this House. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

But, Mr. Chairman, for the purpose of this discussion, let us assume for a moment that the Republicans are right as far as the principles of government involved are concerned. Have they counted the cost of the venture? Let me warn them that they are entering upon a dangerous undertaking. Every authority on the subject, every traveler who has visited those islands and written about them, every line of their history, proves that there is not to-day in all the earth a military power that can take possession of the interior of those islands and reduce them to the pacific condition of an American State. Alien soldiery is powerless amid the deadly shades of the Philippines. No alien army can survive there. No alien power will ever occupy the interior. Spain has never undertaken it.

From the beginning of her occupancy of the Philippines, nearly three hundred years ago, she has recognized the peculiar tribal relations of the natives, because it was impossible to extend actual occupation beyond a few fortified places. Spain has never attempted at any time to permanently occupy the interior of a single one of the islands. When the Spanish soldiers have gone forth on temporary expeditions for the purpose of compelling submission to demands for taxes and tributes, or, as I prefer to characterize it, for the purpose of enforcing systematic robbery, God has avenged the invasion. Death, caused by climatic diseases, has been the penalty paid by Spanish troops sent into the interior, and before we go further in the enterprise which depends for success upon the passage of this bill we should bear in mind that all the authorities concur in the opinion that the chief enemy our brave boys will encounter will be diseases which no European or American army can survive.

Mr. Chairman, the Spaniards, when they sued for peace, were in possession of Manila, Iloilo, and other trade centers on the coast, but were they in possession of the interior of the islands? No; the southern Philippines, containing 3,000,000 people, with whom Spain has scarcely come into contact, are and have ever been practically independent of Spanish authority. Some of these islands have never been explored, much less invaded, and even if climatic conditions would permit military operations, to conquer them would involve an enormous expenditure of life and treasure.

Mr. Chairman, much has been said of the great resources of the Philippines. Why, the gross sum of their exports and imports combined, last year, amounted to less than one-fourth the value of the cotton crop of Texas. [Loud applause.]

And we propose to send 100,000 American troops there. We will need that many before we are through with the proposed enterprise. How many will we bury there?

How many will return? What is the condition of the American Army now in the Philippines? We do not know. Already we have a press censorship rigidly enforced to prevent the wails of our soldiers from reaching the ears of their countrymen. [Loud applause.] Are we to repeat the experience of the English in India? The Englishmen who first invaded the great empire died like vermin by thousands, and those who survived became mere wrecks. The climate of India is far less deadly than that of the Philippines. What reason have you to hope that the soldiers you propose to send to this pestilential country will fare better than did the English in India?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. RIDGLEY. I ask unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman be extended five minutes.

There was no objection.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. If at the outset this Government intended to use Aguinaldo and his followers as long as they could be useful, and then declare them mere rioters and disturbers of the peace, why did we not say so? [Applause.] Common honesty required it. We said nothing of the sort. On the contrary, we armed the Filipinos and asked them to help us. Are we going to say to the people who endangered their lives in support of our flag, whose army in conjunction with ours achieved victory over a common enemy, that having used them as long as they could be useful we now demand their submission to a government of our making? Do gentlemen think they can justify such a course by saying we made no promises?

I notice that our State Department says there is not extant a scrap of paper containing expressed recognition of Aguinaldo or promising liberty and independence to the Philippines. Are we going to say to them that it was all right for them to march and suffer and fight, but at the wind-up a change of masters shall be the reward of their devotion? Mr. Chairman, if we can not do anything else, we can at least keep faith with this unfortunate country. Gentlemen say the Filipinos are barbarians. Is that charge borne out by history? Not an authority I have consulted on the subject justifies it. The universal testimony of writers on the subject is to the effect that they are peaceful, law-abiding, lovable—a people whose only crime has been abhorrence of oppression.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. But suppose we allow the barbarians to have their own vine tree?

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. If they are a peaceful and law-abiding people, then they are capable of self-government, because that precisely defines self-government, which is to be law-abiding.

Mr. Chairman, if gentlemen will read the history of Philippine insurrections, they will find that the islanders have rebelled, not against the Spanish Government, but against the government of the friars. A score of times within two centuries the Filipinos have taken the field, and invariably they have demanded the expulsion of the friars and a termination of a government not to be characterized as a union of church and state, but a government of petty exactions, of petty impositions, of cruel penalties, administered by the religious orders. Until within the past year they never demanded the withdrawal of Spain from those islands, but they demanded a change in the methods of municipal government.

Can we effect the reforms for which they have fought? We will be powerless to do so. In the first instance, will we not be compelled to do as General Shafter did at Santiago—adopt the municipal government now in operation there? I do not see how we can do anything else. An invading power is compelled to do this. Are we going to enforce continuance of this government at the point of the bayonet? How long will we compel obedience to it? Until we find a better? When will we find it? At the end we will be compelled to hand over the government to the people as the only way of terminating military control. Colonization will not change the population. The islands never will be occupied by Europeans nor by Americans.

They will be occupied by the natives and such soldiers as we send there. Will the natives become more capable by repression and the presence of the soldiery to overawe them? The Romans occupied Great Britain for three hundred years, and when they departed the islanders had lost the power to order and control their most immaterial domestic affairs.

Mr. Chairman, if the Filipinos are to learn the art of self-government, it must be in the school of experience. Every day of acquiescence in the reign of an alien power would dull their capabilities. The guardianship proposed is justified by the olden plea of the oppressor—a desire to benefit the victims of greed. Enforce it, and you consign the Filipinos to slavery and convert the great Republic hitherto the exponent of the tenets of liberty and justice into the copartner and ally of those rapacious nations whose deeds of violence and aggression have deluged the world in blood and filled it with slaves.

Mr. Chairman, if we are to do this hideous thing, then let the maxims of free government be expunged from the literature of the Republic, for they are obsolete; muffle the bell in Independence Hall, for it may never again proclaim liberty to the inhabitants of all the world; tear from the uplifted hand of the colossal statue which stands as a sentinel at the port of our chief city the torch of Liberty enlightening the world and place there a sword, dripping with the blood of patriots slaughtered by our legions while defending their homes from invasion and their country from enslavement. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. HAY].

The question was taken; and the Chairman announced that the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. HAY. Division, Mr. Chairman.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 77, noes 92.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. McCLELLAN. Mr. Chairman, I offer the amendment which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

In lines 7 and 8, page 1, strike out the words "an Adjutant-General's Department, an Inspector-General's Department" and insert the words "a general staff."

Mr. McCLELLAN. Mr. Chairman, the purpose of this amendment is the creation of a general staff. I have talked so much during the last few days upon the question of a general staff that I shall not weary the committee by any long discussion of the subject. The necessity of a general staff has been most admirably expressed in the Journal of the Military Service Institution of the United States for July, 1892, by Col. Theodore A. Bingham, of the Corps of Engineers, one of the most brilliant and talented officers in the service. He says:

The Prussian great general staff system is at once the cleverest and the most successful military invention of our age. Its field is very large, of primary importance, and the one which we have heretofore altogether neglected, but which is, nevertheless, the one we must now thoroughly work, not only that we may not be defenseless, but also that we may carry out to its practical and common-sense conclusion the true American principle of military institutions in a free Republic.

Gen. Bronsart von Schellendorf, in his book, The Duties of the General Staff, says:

The peace duties of the general staff should prepare it for its duties in war. The staff of an army supplies brains, information, and maps.

I desire to say that if this amendment should be agreed to, I shall later offer a further amendment covering the organization of the proposed general staff.

There is an erroneous impression among a great many people that a general staff must necessarily be temporary and made up by assignment, for a term of years only, from the line of the Army. There is only one instance in the world where such is the case, and that is England, and England has really no general staff whatever, in the modern meaning of the word.

It is sometimes said in advocacy of our present absurd and obsolete staff system, that it is the English system and that the English system has proved its excellence by actual trial in modern times. In the first place, our system is not the English system of to-day, but the English system of one hundred years ago. In the second place, the English organization, superior as it is to ours, has in practice failed dismally. The only trial it has had in modern times was in the Crimean war, which certainly can not be cited as an argument that the British staff is either competent or effective.

The English papers flatter themselves that Kitchener's campaign against Khartoum was a signal triumph for British organization and for British methods. Let me state the real facts about that campaign. Kitchener was the sirdar of the Egyptian army. For the time being he was not an officer in the British army. He had an absolutely free hand, untrammeled by orders or suggestions from the war office. He took eighteen months to make his preparations. At the end of that time his army was ready to commence the campaign that ended in giving Khartoum to Great Britain and in making him famous. But during his eighteen months of preparation he had completely remodeled his command. He found it with the English staff system and gave it the Prussian. The Soudan expedition was conducted under the Prussian system, with the Prussian organization, and on Prussian methods. Khartoum was taken, not by Kitchener, the red-tape British officer, but by Kitchener, the highly educated, thoroughly modern officer of the Prussian general staff. If the opponents of the Prussian system can find any comfort in Kitchener's success, I am sure that, as far as I am concerned, they are entirely welcome to it.

The general staff, I should propose, would be composed of a small number of men, made up by amalgamation of the Inspector-General's Department and the Adjutant-General's Department, with the present Adjutant-General at the head of the general staff corps, and any further officers needed would be obtained by temporary detail from the line of the Army.

The amendment I will offer is as follows. On pages 8 and 9, strike out all of sections 6 and 7 and insert a new section, as follows:

SEC. 6. That the general staff shall consist of 1 major-general, who shall be chief of the general staff; 2 brigadier-generals; 3 colonels; 6 lieutenant-colonels; 12 majors, and 26 captains.

The present Adjutant-General's Department and Inspector-General's Department are hereby consolidated in the general staff, the officers of the two departments taking precedence, with their present rank, according to date of commission: Provided, That upon the consolidation of the Adjutant-General's Department and the Inspector-General's Department the present Adjutant-General shall become the chief of the general staff. No promotion in the general staff shall then be made until, by death, resignation, or retirement, the number of officers in each grade shall be reduced below the number provided for in this section.

All officers of the general staff must serve not less than two years with line troops, in the grade of their commissions, and will not be eligible for promotion to a higher grade until such service has been performed: Provided, That this return to duty with line troops shall recur once in every ten years.

It provides for 1 major-general, 2 brigadier-generals, 3 colonels, 6 lieutenant-colonels, 12 majors, and 26 captains, a total of 50 officers, as against 43 as provided for in the Hull bill, for the two departments, at an increased expense of only $1,500. In other words, for an increase of $1,500 a year, by this reorganization we can obtain a modern, flexible, general staff for the Army; and I appeal to all gentlemen, whether Democrats, Republicans, or Populists, whether they are in favor of increasing the Army or not, to vote for this amendment and give the Army a proper head and an efficient staff.

Mr. HULL. Mr. Chairman, I hope the amendment will not be adopted. We have followed the plan in the staff as now organized, and this amendment only applies to two of the organizations. I regard the Inspector-General's Department as one of great importance. Better results could be obtained by keeping it as it is until we can go into the question of the general staff as an independent measure. I hope the measure will not be adopted.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. LACEY. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out, in lines 4 and 5, the words "one lieutenant-general."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

In lines 4 and 5, page 1, strike out the words "one lieutenant-general."

Mr. LACEY. Mr. Chairman, on this question the American people have thought and talked for many years. In the beginning of the civil war we found very soon that it was desirable to have several men eligible at the same time to command the Army, of substantially the same rank. We tried one man and he proved inadequate to the emergency. He was placed in a subordinate capacity by assignment by the President, and another was tried, and another, and another, until one was found worthy of this high command; and the policy of the nation for many years has been simply to withhold the stars of the lieutenant-general until some man by virtue of great deeds should become so thoroughly recognized as the one man to command the whole Army that there could be no question about it.

And taking that view of it, Grant was made lieutenant-general. Sherman and Sheridan successively succeeded to the same place. Now, in the Spanish war, suppose it had continued three or four years instead of one hundred and thirteen days? Who knows what the result would have been? Who knows what captain or lieutenant would have risen in that time to command the confidence of the people and of the Army sufficient so that all would concede that he should command the whole forces? I have no doubt the man was there, but who could name him? Would he of necessity have been selected from among the present major-generals? Not at all. Some man would have risen, like Sheridan did, perhaps, from a quartermaster's position to command the Armies of the United States.

Now, we make a mistake if we undertake to pick out from some of the members of the present Army one man and create him lieutenant-general. If thus selected, he becomes by virtue of his rank absolutely entitled to command the whole Army. It is perfectly safe to assign any one of the major-generals to the command of the Army. If he should fail, his place could readily be filled by another without retiring him entirely from the service. This has been our policy in the past. It has worked well; and there is no reason for changing it now when the war is over. There is no one who would be singled out as having distinguished himself in the late brief war so greatly as to entitle him necessarily to this rank.

In the Navy the case is different. There is no difficulty there. The minds of all our people, either upon the land or the sea, would point to Admiral Dewey as entitled to the highest rank that can be conferred upon him. [Applause.] But in the Army there is no such a situation as to require, authorize, or justify the creation of this particular place in the Army reorganization bill, and I believe it would be a mistake to insert any such provision. If we could submit now to a viva voce vote or a showing of hands to this House the names of the persons who would be regarded as eligible to the rank of lieutenant-general, would the hands go up unanimously in favor of one particular general or another? Is there any particular individual that the minds of the people point to so unhesitatingly and unerringly as to justify his selection for this high place? Surely not.

We have one bill providing for two lieutenant-generals and a full general. This would be still more objectionable. The difficulty about some features of this bill (I do not criticise them) is this: It is natural that the committee should have called upon the various officials of the Army for suggestions, and those officials have been free to make them. But it is also natural that in making them they should look out for their particular arm of the service, or for some particular official that they have in mind.

Whom my friend, the chairman of the committee, has in view for this particular place, if he has anyone, is not a question now for us to consider; the question is whether we shall change the policy of the nation upon this subject and confer upon some one man in time of peace a rank by virtue of which he must of necessity be the commanding general of our whole Army in time of war, whether experience should pick him out or develop him as the proper man for the place or not. For these reasons I think this provision should be changed. The bill is likely to become a law, and it should not have a blemish like this in its first section.

Before closing let me say that Washington, Scott, Grant, Sherman, and Sheridan——

Mr. MARSH. And Schofield.

Mr. LACEY. And Schofield are all who have ever held this place. This is a list that it is difficult to add to. When the time comes for great deeds, the man, too, appears. The Spanish war was too brief to develop the soldier who might be worthy to succeed to this great title, and it should be held in abeyance.

Mr. DOCKERY. Mr. Chairman, I had intended to offer the amendment which has been offered by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. LACEY], and had asked the Chair to recognize me for that purpose, but while absent from the Chamber for a moment the pending amendment was offered by the gentleman from Iowa. It has my hearty and cordial support.

Mr. Chairman, we may differ, as we do, in regard to many of the provisions of this bill. A great many of them, I think, are opposed by gentlemen on both sides of the Chamber. Some of the objections to these provisions I shall state later on in the debate, but the amendment offered by the gentleman from Iowa should receive the hearty and unanimous support of both sides of the House. It is not necessary for me to restate the reasons which have been advanced in support of the amendment. They have been well enforced by the gentleman from Iowa. It seems to me they are conclusive, and I hope that without further debate the House will by a unanimous vote agree to the amendment of the gentleman from Iowa.

Mr. FLEMING. Mr. Chairman, I had hoped to have the opportunity to make before the House an argument against what I had understood to be the Administration's policy of imperialism. I regret that I was not able to obtain the time in which to present this argument; and I shall therefore have to avail myself of the privilege allowed by the House and have it printed in the RECORD, where it will be found by anyone who may have interest enough in it to look for it.

I will say, however, in passing, that as one of the conclusions of my own analysis or investigation of this subject I admit that the United States Government has full and ample power to acquire territory as an inherent element of the sovereignty of the nation. And it is entirely immaterial where that territory may lie or what may be the character of the people who inhabit it. But when you have granted that much, the important question still remains, what powers have we under the Constitution to govern the people who inhabit that territory?

Now, while the power of acquisition is, in my opinion, unlimited, there are certain restrictions in favor of the civil and personal rights of American citizens, no matter where they live, which will necessarily attach themselves to all the inhabitants of our newly acquired territory. We have the power in Congress to regulate their political status in the sense of defining and establishing a character of government in accordance with our own ideas; but certain personal and civil rights of an American citizen are guaranteed by the Constitution, and they can not be denied on any foot of land over which our flag floats as the emblem of our sovereign power.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I for one do not believe that with these restrictions placed upon us we could possibly govern the people who inhabit the Philippine Islands. They are not prepared, in their customs or habits, in their methods of thought or self-restraint, to admit of the application to them of the restrictions which our own Constitution places upon us in governing them.

We hear, and have heard, Mr. Chairman, a great deal about the "open-door policy" in the Philippine Islands. Sir, there will be no open door in the Philippines, except upon a basis of absolute free trade. The Constitution of the United States prevents it. The decisions of the courts of the land are uniform, that the tax laws of this country go pari passu with its authority; and the moment the military arm is taken off the people of the Philippine Islands, that moment our tax laws attach and become paramount there. Hence this "open-door policy" of which we hear so much can only exist on a basis of absolute free trade.

Now, is the Republican party ready to give that open-door policy a trial on such terms? Nobody believes it; certainly nobody on this side of the House. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. HULL. Mr. Chairman, I only want to say a word or two in reference to the pending amendment with regard to the position of the Committee on Military Affairs on the question presented by the gentleman from Iowa and the amendment he presents relating to the office of lieutenant-general.

There were bills before us providing for a general and two lieutenant-generals of the Army. I will say to the House that there was no one in the War Department urging the creation of the office of lieutenant-general. There were, of course, some members of the Army asking that the rank of general and two lieutenant-generals should be authorized by the bill—but not by the War Department. And I will say to my good friend from Iowa [Mr. LACEY] that the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs had absolutely nobody in his mind, either for this or any other office, in connection with the pending bill.

But so far as the creation of this office is concerned a large number of gentlemen with whom I have conversed believe that if the Army of the United States was more than an army corps, the commanding officer should have the rank of a lieutenant-general. So far as I am concerned, and I think I voice the opinion of the majority of my colleagues, we have no pride of opinion on this question, but believe it to be our duty, in view of the agitation which has been going on for three years in regard to this matter, to bring it in and let the members of the House decide it as they may. We will be satisfied with their decision, whatever it shall be.

Mr. STEELE. I would like to ask the gentleman who he thinks is responsible for the agitation of this question of creating the office of lieutenant-general?

Mr. HULL. Well, Mr. Chairman, I do not propose to answer such questions. I do not know, as a matter of fact.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask my friend from Iowa a question, with his consent.

Mr. HULL. I yield, of course, with pleasure.

Mr. CANNON. In view of the fact, if I may be permitted to make the suggestion, that there is a motion to strike out this provision which creates, if it be adopted, the office of lieutenant-general, a position that does not now exist in the Army, and as there seems to be a consensus of opinion amongst members that the motion might well be adopted without reflecting upon anybody, and as a lieutenant-general does not seem to be necessary to our Army organization to win victories, does not my friend think that he might assent to the motion, and later on such a provision can be made with reference to the matter as may meet his judgment and the opinions of the members of the House? In other words, the office of lieutenant-general may be created, if there be a sentiment in support of it, to be determined hereafter.

Mr. DOCKERY. Mr. Chairman, the word "if" is a good word that the gentleman has used in this connection.

Mr. CANNON. I suggest this with all due deference to my friend from Iowa. I think the members of the House, of course, are competent to pass on it, just as competent now as they will be hereafter, and I shall be satisfied whichever way the question is determined.

Mr. HULL. I will state to my friend from Illinois that I have no objection whatever. I am perfectly willing to let the matter be determined by the vote of the House at this time. [Cries of "Vote!" "Vote!"]

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the motion submitted by the gentleman from Iowa.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. DOCKERY. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word of the pending proposition for the purpose of making an inquiry of the gentleman in charge of the bill.

I am advised that under existing law three major-generals are authorized for the Army. I desire to ask the chairman of the committee, in view of his announced purpose of fixing the minimum strength of the Army at 50,000 and the maximum at 100,000, in the discretion of the President, whether or not it will involve any change in the pending paragraph in regard to the major-generals?

Mr. HULL. Mr. Chairman, in answer to the gentleman from Missouri I will state that the number of major-generals should be determined largely by the scope of territory over which the Army must operate, as well as the size of the Army itself. And these major-generals are absolutely as important now as three were when we were confined to the territory occupied actually by our troops prior to the war.

If the time should come and the conditions should change, no matter whether that change be near or remote, you will have the power to change that condition with reference to the rank of these officers; and this is more particularly the case in view of the fact that these men who will hold the positions are men who are rapidly nearing retirement, and that can be accomplished when the time comes without doing injury to the service when it is found that we do not need their services.

Mr. DOCKERY. But if the minimum of the Army is fixed at 50,000, it occurred to me that the bill ought not to carry a top-heavy complement of officers.

Mr. HULL. Well, I will say to my friend that the time may come when you will need all of these men, even with the smaller number of forces proposed by the bill, just as much as if we had the larger Army.

If the time comes when you have but few troops in Cuba, Porto Rico, the Philippines, and the Ladrones, then if we still have these departments, if we occupy them, we can determine whether we need men of the higher rank to administer affairs. We may need the six major-generals with an army of 50,000 as much as with an army of 100,000. And to my mind it would be inexpedient and unwise to cut down the number provided for in the bill.

Mr. DOCKERY. I have but a limited technical knowledge of the organization of the Army, and obviously a gentleman not connected with the committee would find it somewhat difficult to prepare amendments; but I suppose that at some point along the line the gentleman proposes to offer an amendment to fix the minimum at 50,000. Now, the question which occurs to me is whether that reduction is to apply to the rank and file and to allow the officers to remain undisturbed, or whether the amendment which the gentleman proposes to offer will also reduce the number of officers as well as the number of men.

Mr. HULL. A time may come when we will not need six major-generals, but the question of the reduction of the Army to 50,000 would not be the determining factor in that question, to my mind.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Chairman, I wish to add just this much to the discussion of the question raised by the gentleman from Missouri. The organization of the Army is not alone the organization provided for by the bill before the House, but it becomes necessary to have departments, as the gentleman is quite well aware.

Now, under the organization that gave us a little over 20,000 men, we had in this country a department of the East, a department of the coast, and a central department, three great leading departments. In each of them we had a major-general in command. Then we had a General Commanding, which is after all more a fiction than a reality. The General Commanding commands whoever the President orders him to command, and is just as much subject to the orders of the President and just as much compelled to take and assume the commands which the President gives him as is a colonel or a brigadier-general.

Now, we all of us agree that for a time to come, we know not how long, we shall have Cuba, possibly Porto Rico, I do not know, and surely the Philippines at present. I am not going to be drawn into any discussion about the future. Six major-generals, therefore, will not only not be out of proportion to the department, but they will not be out of proportion to the increased volume of the Army.

Now, another word, while I am on my feet. I hope we shall not legislate upon this bill with reference to the advancement or retirement of men. The last vote taken, to which I bow, because it was overwhelming, was in all respects to me a very significant vote; and yet I regret that in a time like this, when we are legislating necessarily for some years of the organization of the Army, anything should have happened that would make personal considerations paramount to our better judgment.

I do not say that has had the effect, but I hope it may not have the effect, for we ought to bear in mind at last that the organization of the Army, the promotion of its generals, either to the rank of a lieutenant-general or to any of the other grades, is all under the control of the President, and if there were a lieutenant-general of the Army to-day, or if there were a senior and ranking major-general of the Army to-day whom the President of the United States deemed to be in a position not the most satisfactory, he could dispose of that question readily and always without any difficulty or trouble.

Why, I remember not a great many years ago when one of the great generals that came from the war of the rebellion, who was the General of the Army, as we call him, differed with the Secretary of War about his jurisdiction. The question was settled as it has always been settled, in favor of the Secretary of War, and General Sherman took himself away to St. Louis and stayed there and frankly and bluntly said that under the existing order of things there was not anything for him to do.

So we need not worry about who is to be this or who is to be that. The rule of the law of the Army that makes it imperative that unless there is a good reason to the contrary every man shall be promoted by seniority up to the grade of and including colonel, by fair implication as well as by the utterance of law, gives to the President, without limitation and without the duty or the right of the people to criticise him, the absolute power to determine who shall be major-generals and brigadier-generals and lieutenant-generals, and who shall or shall not be the Major-General Commanding.

Mr. RAY of New York. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words for the purpose simply of making an inquiry of the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs.

I notice that you provide here in the bill for a record and pension office as a department of the Army.

Mr. HULL. A separate bureau.

Mr. RAY of New York. A separate bureau. Is that intended or designed to make any change in the present system?

Mr. HULL. Not in the present system. You will notice on page 18 it provides a change in the personnel, or rather the rank of the chief officer.

Mr. RAY of New York. Simply the rank.

Mr. HULL. It also provides for an assistant with the rank of lieutenant-colonel.

Mr. RAY of New York. Does it make any change, or is it intended to make any change, in the general mode or manner of administering the pension laws?

Mr. HULL. No, sir; it does not contemplate that. We regard the Record and Pension Office as so admirably run now that we are satisfied with it, and believe the man who inaugurated the reforms should receive substantial recognition.

Mr. RAY of New York. It is intended to make permanent the present system.

Mr. HULL. As a bureau of the War Department.

Mr. RAY of New York. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw my amendment.

Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri is recognized.

Mr. DOCKERY. Mr. Chairman, I do not desire to detain the committee but just a moment. Remarks falling from the lips of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR] seemed to indicate that there was some purpose, covert and concealed and not expressed, on the part of some gentlemen on the floor, in sustaining the proposition of the gentlemen from Iowa [Mr. LACEY], to strike the position of lieutenant-general from the bill. I had no concealed purpose. I am against the creation of the rank of lieutenant-general simply because I do not think it necessary for the efficiency of the Army.

Now, then, as to the question of the 6 major-generals and 12 brigadier-generals, and other officers to follow, I ask the chairman to state his views, as he has recently announced his purpose to present some proposition fixing a minimum limit of 50,000 for the Army. We desire to know the terms of the amendment, so that we may intelligently offer amendments to the bill. I want to know, I will say very frankly, and I think the House is entitled to know, whether it is the purpose of the gentleman in charge of the bill to maintain all the officers now provided by the bill and make the reduction in the rank and file of the Army.

Mr. COX. That is what it is.

Mr. DOCKERY. The House is entitled to know, because it is impossible to offer amendments intelligently unless we get a direct answer to the question.

Mr. HULL. Does the gentleman want me to answer that now?

Mr. DOCKERY. In your own time. I have only five minutes. The gentleman from Iowa is entirely frank, and I know he will give the House a frank answer to the question. I ask him the question because I remember—it is a matter of history, and not by way of criticism—the fact that the first bill the gentleman from Iowa brought to this House, when we were standing on the threshold of the war with Spain, was prepared in the War Department, and proposed a Regular Army of 104,000 men, which, had it been enacted, would practically have disposed of the necessity of volunteers in that war. The House will remember that after debate running two or three days the bill was recommitted to the Committee on Military Affairs on the 7th of April, on the motion of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MARSH], by a vote of 155 to 61. That is simply a historic recital.

The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HULL] has been consistent not only in respect to the bill then presented and recommitted, but, as I believe, also in this bill, in giving expression, so far as the legislation of the committee is concerned, to the wishes of the War Department. Let us know, at the outstart of the consideration of this bill under the five-minute rule, whether the entire corps of officers is to consist of the same number as the corps would have numbered if the Army had been fixed at 100,000 men under the provisions of the original bill, and if so, is the reduction to be made in the rank and file?

Mr. HULL. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. COX. The chairman of the committee will proceed.

Mr. HULL. I do not want to commence until my time is running.

Mr. Chairman, to go back first to the matter of history the gentleman speaks of, there was a bill presented to this House before the Spanish war which, at its maximum, would be raising the Army to 104,000 men, and would have increased the officers in the Regular Army less than 900 men, organized on the basis of a large force of enlisted men and as few officers as possible. The bill provided for an infantry company of 250 men at a maximum, with a proviso that when recruited to 150 it should be on a war footing. I believe that 150 would be as large an infantry company as it should ever be recruited to. I want to say to my friend from Missouri who antagonized the bill so vigorously that if it had been adopted it would not have cut off the chance of the volunteers participating in the war; it would have been an efficient first line of our fighting force.

Your volunteers would have been in their camps. Not as many, but over 100,000 of them, and it would have saved to the people of the United States in the cost of the war more than $30,000,000. The small regiments and full complement of officers have been expensive. So far as this bill is concerned I want to be frank with the House as to my position. I believe that we have never within the last fifteen years had as many officers in the Regular Army as we should have in the line of the Army. We have skinned the companies of their officers to send them to colleges and to perform other details to the number of 327. When the war broke out we still further depleted the officers of the Regular Army and put them, by advice and consent of the governors of the States, into the volunteer regiments, so that many of the companies of the Regular Army had but one commissioned officer to go on the fighting line with.

I believe that this Government can afford to educate and take care of accomplished officers of the Government in numbers sufficient to meet the necessities of our people not only in time of peace, but in time of war. I do not believe the Government will ever have a sufficient number of educated officers to do away with the National Guard or the volunteers whenever an exigency shall arise. I do not desire anything of that kind. It is a small army, a small force, and you have to depend on the great body of the people for an army if any great war comes.

Now, Mr. Chairman, to come down to the details of this bill, it has been agreed to by the committee, or a majority of the Committee on Military Affairs, that we will reduce the staff in such proportion as to preserve the proper balance between the 50,000 and the 100,000 men but so far as I am concerned, to keep the units of regiments as they are in the bill. We reduce the enlisted force to 50,000 men, but we have the officers of the companies the same as if there were 100,000; and then, if danger comes, if we need an increased army, it can be extended by the mere addition of the enlisted men. That is the theory of it. Mr. Chairman, I now yield to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DOCKERY], who wants to ask a question.

Mr. DOCKERY. It is stated that this bill now provides for 970 new officers of the line and for 633 new staff officers. Is that a correct statement?

Mr. HULL. The report will state that. I will say, Mr. Chairman, that the increase of the staff—400 of it—is in the Medical Department. Now, I stated expressly in my opening speech that in the staff department I referred to the hearings before the committee on the ground that I was not prepared to go into the details of it. I do not believe that the staff will be allowed to remain at the number it is. I do believe we have in the past cut the staff down below what it should have been. When the war came, our regular staff was too small. In other words, we were compelled to bring in from the country a large number of men without experience, who in time would make good staff officers, and we had to quadruple the staff and make it up out of inexperienced men.

Mr. DOCKERY. I want to know whether it is true, as stated by a great metropolitan journal, that this bill adds 970 new officers and 633 new staff officers?

Mr. HULL. If the gentleman will look at the report, page 10, accompanying the bill, he will see that the report, as originally prepared—the committee cut off some officers—provided for 2,599 officers—that the present law, in time of war, gives 1,878 officers; that the Senate bill and the Miles bill give 3,485 officers.

Mr. DOCKERY. What is the number of officers authorized in time of peace?

Mr. HULL. There would be a discharge of two companies from each regiment of infantry, the absolute mustering out of those companies.

Mr. DOCKERY. I wish the gentleman would make a statement, giving us the best information he has.

Mr. HULL. On the 1st of January, 1898, there were 1,625 officers in the United States Army. That was on a peace basis. The bill that we prepared giving these two companies of infantry additional officers raised the number to 1,878. The House bill as originally introduced makes it 2,599.

Mr. HAY. Does the gentleman believe it to be within the range of possibility now to change this bill in Committee of the Whole so as to provide for 50,000 enlisted men? Is it possible for us here to go through all the details necessary to reduce the various organizations, the various officers, and all that sort of thing?

Mr. HULL. I have no doubt of it at all. The committee will have suitable amendments prepared; and when those amendments are prepared and sent to the House for a vote, as I presume they will be, I have no doubt that the number of officers provided for, for the next two years at least, will be away below the number provided for by the substitute of the gentleman from Virginia.

Mr. HAY. Is it not a fact that the officers provided for in this bill amount to about three thousand seven hundred and odd?

Mr. HULL. No, sir.

Mr. HAY. The number comes very close to that.

Mr. HULL. I now yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WALKER] for a question.

Mr. WALKER of Massachusetts. I want to ask the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs this question: If the amendment which the gentleman states the committee propose to offer should be adopted and the force be reduced to 50,000 men instead of that now proposed by the bill, will the officers be any more than doubled, as the present rank and file are doubled?

Mr. HULL. They will not be anywhere near doubled. There will be an increase of about 960 officers, not counting the staff.

Mr. WALKER of Massachusetts. That is to say, with this doubling of the rank and file, the increase of officers—is it now 1,600?

Mr. HULL. One thousand six hundred and odd officers.

Mr. WALKER of Massachusetts. And that number of officers will only be increased about 960?

Mr. HULL. On a peace basis there will be only 960 more than we have now.

Mr. WALKER of Massachusetts. And that will allow a continuance of assigning military officers as instructors to the different schools, colleges, and citizen soldiery of the country?

Mr. HULL. We have applications from all the States to enlarge the present law so that we can make further details of officers to assist in military education in the different States.

Mr. COX. I should like to ask a question.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Iowa has expired.

Mr. COX. Very well; give me five minutes in my own right and I will yield to the gentleman from Iowa.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. COX] is recognized.

Mr. COX. Now, my question is this: If you pass this bill and make it a basis of our Army organization, what would be the increase of officers of the Regular Army?

Mr. HULL. We increase the number of Regular Army officers about nine hundred odd.

Mr. COX. If, then, you increase the number of Regular Army officers nine hundred and odd on a peace basis, what is the necessity for it?

Mr. HULL. We simply keep the officers in command of the troops, and we do not have to increase them if we should have war and there should be a necessity for increasing the companies.

Mr. LACEY. I should like to be recognized to ask my colleague [Mr. HULL] a question for the information of the House.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa will proceed.

Mr. LACEY. On the basis of 100,000 men the expense of maintaining our Army is estimated, as I understand, at about $100,000,000—$1,000 to a man.

Mr. HULL. The estimate of the War Department, which is set out in full in our report, is a little in excess of $82,000,000.

Mr. LACEY. I notice that many of the generals estimate the cost to be in the neighborhood of $1,000 a man.

Mr. HULL. General Corbin said that that had been the cost of the Army in the past.

Mr. LACEY. If we deduct 50,000 enlisted men from the 100,000 proposed, what would be the reduction in the annual expense?

Mr. HULL. Simply the pay proper of the enlisted men, their clothing allowance, their ration allowance, and matters of that kind.

Mr. LACEY. I thought perhaps my colleague could give an approximate estimate of what the reduction would be.

Mr. HULL. That can be figured out exactly if we want it. I would ask the experts in the War Department to figure it; I would not regard myself as competent to do so, if exact figures were required. We have men in the War Department trained in exactly this line of work, and I would call upon them for such information over their signature. But I will say this: Your larger army would not cost as much per man as your smaller army, because, as you will find by looking over the tables furnished by the committee, the proportion of officers to men is much larger in your smaller army than that provided for in this bill. Under the present law the proportion of officers to men is much larger than it would be under this bill.

Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH. I wish to ask the chairman of the committee this question: At what age do these chaplains enter the Army?

Mr. HULL. Under the present law they can enter at as late an age as 63.

Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH. And at the age of 64 they can be retired on two-thirds pay?

Mr. HULL. Yes, sir.

Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH. Does not the gentleman think the law ought to be amended in that particular? I suggest that the committee prepare an amendment which will prevent chaplains from entering the Army at 63 and retiring at 64 on three-fourths pay.

Mr. HULL. The bill as originally submitted by the committee provided that no man should be appointed a chaplain after reaching the age of 30; but subsequently the committee struck out all that section in regard to chaplains. When the proper point in the bill is reached, that question can be brought up.

Mr. DOCKERY. Mr. Chairman, now a single word and I am through.

The actual appropriation for the support of the Army for the fiscal years 1889 to 1898, inclusive—25,000 men, and frequently, I may say in passing, the enlistments were not complete—the actual appropriations for that period were $239,398,707.08, or an average appropriation for the support of the Army for each fiscal year from 1889 to 1898, inclusive, of $23,939,870.70. This exhibit vindicates the old-time estimate, which has been accepted by the Committee on Appropriations from time immemorial, that the average annual cost for each soldier of our Army is about $1,000.

Mr. SPALDING. That includes the officers.

Mr. DOCKERY. Certainly; that includes the entire force, officers and men.

Mr. BINGHAM. You estimate on the basis of the number of men authorized for the Army service?

Mr. DOCKERY. Certainly. I am speaking of the amount which the Government has appropriated to support the Army, which includes officers and men—infantry, cavalry, and artillery, and all other branches of the service.

Mr. BINGHAM. That is the small Army——

Mr. DOCKERY. I speak of the Army of 25,000 men.

Mr. BINGHAM. But the gentleman should remember that we never had that number.

Mr. DOCKERY. Certainly not. That statement makes stronger still the position I have taken.

Mr. BINGHAM. I understand that. I only wanted to get the gentleman right.

Mr. DOCKERY. The smaller the army ofttimes the greater the expense for each soldier.

I have assumed, for the purpose of this calculation, that the Army was up to the maximum, and, even with this assumption, the expenditure is about $1,000 yearly for each soldier. So that practical experience demonstrates that each soldier in the Army costs the taxpayers of this country about $1,000 a year. Fifty thousand men will cost the people not less than $50,000,000 annually and 100,000 men, the maximum proposed by the bill, will cost $100,000,000, and no juggling with estimates in the War Department can reduce the annual expenditure to $82,000,000.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Will my friend from Missouri allow me an interruption just here?

Mr. DOCKERY. Certainly.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. I wish to interrupt my friend to say that, while that is true of the Army stationed in the United States, the estimate would not be true of the men stationed in Cuba, Porto Rico, or in the Philippine Islands, because in these instances our expenditures would be largely increased——

Mr. DOCKERY. Unquestionably; there is no doubt of the correctness of that statement.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi (continuing). And that 30 or 40 per cent must be added to the expense.

Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana. Mainly for transportation.

Mr. DOCKERY. Certainly.

Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana. So that the expense would be largely increased in the illustration suggested by the gentleman from Mississippi.

Mr. DOCKERY. The cost of transportation will be enormously increased in case of the occupation of foreign territory.

Mr. MARSH. Will the gentleman from Missouri permit an interruption?

Mr. DOCKERY. I will.

Mr. MARSH. I wanted to say, in connection with what the gentleman from Missouri said about the 50,000 minimum and 100,000 maximum in the Army, that 10,000 troops would cost the Government only $10,000,000; and 5,000 would cost the Government only $5,000,000, and 1,000 troops would cost the Government but $1,000,000——

Mr. SIMPSON. Then let us make it 1,000 troops. [Laughter.]

Mr. DOCKERY. That is true, and I regret, Mr. Chairman, that the distinguished gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MARSH] who interrupts me has changed his views on the general question. On the 7th day of April last, when the bill to reorganize the Army was under consideration, he entertained opinions which seem to have changed since that time. He was then opposed, as I was, to that increase, and I am now opposed to the proposed increase of the Regular Army.

For reasons "satisfactory to himself" he does not now object to a provision for increasing the standing army to 50,000 as a minimum and 100,000 as a maximum, in the discretion of the President. Obviously the gentleman entertained a different opinion when, at the last session, he moved to recommit the Army bill.

Mr. Chairman, the House may as well understand the question that confronts it. The minimum limit has been conceived in a desire to quiet the mutterings of discontent, which come largely from gentlemen on the other side of the Chamber. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

The amendment, however, deceives no one. Speaking for myself, I will say that I would as readily intrust the great discretion of increasing the Regular Army by 50,000 men to the present Chief Executive as to any other Executive who might be chosen by the Republican party. But, sir, I would not give to Thomas Jefferson himself, if he were now President, the dangerous power in time of peace to increase the standing army of the United States from 50,000 to 100,000 men. [Applause.]

I would not be willing to trust that great Virginian who founded my party with such vast discretion, involving as it does the taxing power, and involving as well the liberties of the people. I have a high personal regard for the present Executive, but I am unwilling to commit to any Chief Magistrate the right to use in time of peace both the Treasury and the sword at his discretion. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, in time of peace, for the period that the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DOCKERY] has referred to, when in round numbers we had twenty-five thousand plus in the Regular Army——

Mr. HULL. Twenty-five thousand minus.

Mr. CANNON. The gentleman says twenty-five thousand minus, but for the period when we had, in round numbers, 25,000 men in the Regular Army we had 1,600 officers. We had, as I understand it, in the Regular Army from the war standpoint, which consisted of sixty thousand men plus, under existing legislation, 2,500 officers.

Mr. HULL. Eighteen hundred in the line of the Army. There was an immense increase in the staff of the volunteers.

Mr. CANNON. Eighteen hundred in the line of the Army. That is correct. I have the statement in my hand. Now it is proposed, I find, after talking with the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs, that if this bill passes, when the Committee on Military Affairs get through with it, if the House follows the recommendations of that committee, there will, in round numbers, be 2,300 officers for an army the minimum of which is 50,000, and the 2,300 officers would be sufficient for the maximum, if required. I believe I have stated it correctly.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. May I ask the gentleman a question right there?

Mr. CANNON. Just in a moment. In other words, the more men you have in the Army, the less the number of officers in proportion. Now, one word as to the cost. It costs something to live, to stop at a hotel, to stop at a bording house.

Mr. MAHON. Especially in Washington. [Laughter.]

Mr. CANNON. The annual expenses of 75,000,000 people are simply enormous, but that is no reason why 75,000,000 people should all die in one minute.

Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana. Nor any reason why they should waste their substance.

Mr. CANNON. No; nor any reason why they should waste their substance. Now, I will say to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DOCKERY] and the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. JOHNSON], that there can be in my mind no doubt but what wisdom and the best interests of all the people require an Army with a minimum of fifty thousand and a possible maximum of a hundred thousand, and whether it costs much or little, I have but little patience with the man who would inquire the cost if the enlistment of the men be necessary for the public defense. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. WALKER of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, there is not a man in this House nor in this country who does not know that the very existence of civil liberty, as well the consent of the governed, so that their consent may be had and acted upon, is dependent in the last analysis upon physical force—on our courts of justice, our constables and police officers, and finally the Army. Not to keep in subjection law-abiding citizens; not to keep the workingmen from committing acts of violence when there are strikes, but to prevent those men who take advantage of strikes to do acts of violence in spite of the strikers and to create a condition of war. We must have an army. Every man admits that.

Now, the question is as to its size. Why, for 70,000,000 people scattered over a territory the size of the United States, with the confessed necessity for the existence of forts, the manning of forts, the caring for guns in forts, the maintaining of good order, 25,000 men are confessedly too few; 50,000 is the least number desirable. Why talk about the expense when you are talking about the number? Let us decide what the number is, and we can then control the expense. We can cut the pay of officers and men down one-half, if we choose—there is no difficulty about that—if we think we are paying them too much. We can draft men into the service and do the injustice of making them serve for nothing, if we choose. That is a question which does not rightly enter into this debate. That is within the power of Congress to determine at any time. The question is, Do we need 50,000 men? If we need 50,000 men in time of peace—and I believe it is conceded that we do—let us agree on the 50,000 men.

Now, the next question is, How can we maintain an adequate force at the least additional expense? I am told that we add only 900 officers to this Army to which we propose to add 25,000 men. I submit to this House that to educate this force and the volunteers, to educate the National Guards, 900 officers in addition to what we now have are not half enough. Instead of being too many, 900 are not enough, even if we never need to increase the Army to 100,000 men.

Mr. COX. I should like to ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. WALKER of Massachusetts. I have only a minute. The next question comes up with reference to the economy of educating our citizen soldiery outside of the Regular Army, and then, as I said, the question of increasing the Army. Again, will you trust the President? Dare you trust the President? I ought to put the question the other way. Dare you leave this Army at 25,000 men, and dare you not trust the President to act in an exigency? When war with Spain was threatened, even when it was known long before we declared war that we should come to war, if this law had then been on the statute books and the President had quietly recruited the Army to 100,000 men "during the existence of the exigency, or for the war," so that they might be discharged at any time, we are assured it would have saved us $30,000,000 over what 100,000 men actually cost.

Shall we reorganize our Army in view of this fact and have an adequate force provided in case of another exigency? One more thing, and I am done. The conditions of peace, call ourselves as intelligent, as enlightened, and as Christian as we may—the conditions of peace are that the physical prowess of this nation, to a reasonable amount, shall be committed to the hand of the President ready for use in an exigency; and an exigency will not then arise. In the little war threatened with Chile we should have been beaten, and disgracefully beaten, at the beginning, if it had occurred when we were suspicious of it; and if we had the organization proposed at the beginning of our war with Spain not only $30,000,000 would have been saved, but many, many lives.

Mr. VANDIVER. Mr. Chairman, not having had a suitable opportunity to protest against the principles of the bill itself, I avail myself of this the only opportunity to express my protest against the enacting clause. What is it that we are asked to do? To increase the standing army of the United States to 100,000 men, 50,000 of them certainly to be enlisted, the other 50,000 to be enlisted at the pleasure, the will, or perhaps the caprice of the President of the United States. I am not here to impeach the honesty, the integrity, or the patriotism of the present occupant of the White House. I would be as much opposed to the principles of this bill if the occupant of the White House were a Democrat as I am when he is a Republican.

Sir, when we are told by the gentleman from Illinois and other advocates of this bill that there is "no danger" in this extreme delegation of power to one individual, I am reminded that in the whole history of the world every passage that has been made from free government to despotism has been made with that sign held up to the public: "No danger! No danger!" I am reminded, sir, that when Augustus Cæsar assumed the powers of emperor in Rome this same plea was made, that the republic was in no danger, because he declined the titles of king and dictator and only called himself a princeps or leader. The senate still sat, and for three hundred years continued, nominally at least, to hold the position of a legislative body, whereas in reality they only served to register the decrees of one man.

The great Gibbon, in that immortal work, The Decline and Fall of the Roman Empire, shows how gradually, step by step, all of the executive and then the legislative functions of government were centered in one man—the victorious general of the army.

"Augustus," says the historian, "wished to deceive the people by an image of civil liberty and the army by an image of civil government. He was sensible that mankind is governed by names; nor was he deceived in his expectation that the senate and people would submit to slavery, provided they were respectfully assured that they still enjoyed their ancient freedom."

And thus it has ever been. Power grows like other things, by exercise. Military usurpation has never been without the sanction of some previous grant of power by the people. "Eternal vigilance is the price of liberty." [Applause.]

Now, I call attention of the House to the answer of the gentleman from Ohio, who, when interrogated yesterday as to what he wanted to do with this standing army of 100,000 men in time of peace, replied that we needed them to protect our citizens against the violence of mobs. He has judiciously, perhaps wisely, left a part of his answer out of the RECORD, but those who heard his words will remember that he expressed himself in favor of a standing army to protect the people against mob violence. So, too, the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WALKER] who has just taken his seat stated that one of the necessities for this great standing army was that the President might be able to protect the people of this country against those who would commit violence in times of strikes. So we see that the foreign war scare is only being used to obscure the real purpose, which will crop out occasionally, and which is to put it into the power of the Administration to use this great standing army to suppress any violence which he may choose to consider unlawful.

Mr. Chairman, in considering the immense expense of a hundred and fifty million dollars, which this bill will call for, I call attention to this simple fact, that in the days of Andrew Jackson, in the days of simplicity and honest economy in the administration of the Government, only $3 per capita was necessary to defray the expenses of this Government; that during the days of the first administration of Benjamin Harrison it required about $5 per capita, and that during the present year it has required over $11 per capita, and if you will strike out all the expenses connected with the Spanish war it will still be over $7 per capita to run the Government of this country, to say nothing of State, county, and local taxation. Therefore, when you make a further attempt to withdraw a large number of citizens from the productive classes of society and put them into a class who are to be supported out of the labor of others, you are largely and unnecessarily adding to the burdens of taxation. Where is this extravagance to end? For the General Government alone it means about $35 per year from the average man with wife and three children, and I tell you he is tired of it.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. VANDIVER. I should like to have a few minutes more in which to conclude my remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman asks unanimous consent that his time may be extended five minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. VANDIVER. Mr. Chairman, there are provisions in this bill that I would seriously object to—there are a number of them. But I object most emphatically and most positively to the principle of the bill itself. What are we asked to do? To give the President power to raise an army of 100,000 men in time of peace, when 50,000 is all that is claimed to be necessary even by the advocates of the bill.

Mr. Chairman, it seems to me that gentlemen have gone out of their way to find a suitable method—as I would think, an unsuitable method—of furnishing the President with an opportunity to reward political followers. There are not enough offices to be filled by civil appointment in the various bureaus and departments of the Government, but in order that those who have the appointing power may have the privilege of appointing their friends to office we are to fasten upon the taxpayers of this country an additional expense for the support of a standing army of 100,000 men.

I am opposed to it not only on account of the expense, for if it were necessary I would be willing to vote the expense of 100,000 men to carry on war against any foreign foe, but I am opposed to this bill because it creates a standing army for the defense of our country instead of a volunteer army. When I review the history of the world, I think I discover that all the great battles that have been fought for freedom have been fought by volunteer soldiers, and all the great battles of history that have been waged against the liberties of mankind have been waged by standing armies.

I remember that during the great period of the civil war in this country the brave heroes on both sides were men who had gone to battle, not as professional soldiers, not as the men who had chosen war for a profession, but as men who had stepped out of the ordinary walks or occupations of life temporarily only for the purpose of defending the right as they understood it, and with the intention of returning to their occupations when that unhappy strife was over.

I am opposed to the principle itself of a large standing army, not only because of the large expense connected with it, but also because I believe that when you select a man for the profession of war you encourage the military spirit; you give him to understand that hereafter he is not to be a self-supporting citizen, but he is to be kept in idleness and training for the part of a butcher. I grant that a few of them are needed, but the fewer the better. You are encouraging militarism, which is opposed to the natural spirit of our people and the spirit of our institutions.

But, sir, if I had the opportunity, I would like to go further and ask why it is you take advantage of the sentiment of patriotism which is just now making itself felt for a large army because of the present emergency. There is not a gentleman on this floor who is willing to stand up and say that we need that standing army for the support of the Government of the United States against foreign foes. What do we need them for? If they are needed for the Philippine Islands, it is only to take and hold possession of a country thousands of miles distant from our own shores against the will and against the wishes of its own people.

I am opposed to this bill, further, Mr. Chairman, because, instead of a standing army of 100,000, we can easily give the President all the soldiers that are necessary to conclude the war with Spain, if it is not already concluded, and authorize him to enlist them for a period of two years or even three years. But when you come to us and ask us to make a permanent provision in this country for a military establishment of 100,000 men, at an expense of $150,000,000 per year, to be supported by the toiling masses of patriotic, self-respecting, and self-supporting citizens, I must oppose it. [Applause.]

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, it is well that we should take our bearings early in this five-minute debate on the pending measure. There are some facts here which should be burned into the mind of every gentleman on this floor. This bill, as originally brought in here, provided for an army of 100,000 men. It quadrupled the Army that we possessed when the war with Spain commenced. It more than quadrupled the expenses of maintaining that Army. That purpose was so monstrous on its very face that it not only awakened the uncompromising opposition on the other side of the main aisle to this Chamber, but there have been mutterings of an approaching storm on this side which it has been illy attempted to conceal and which the gentleman in the White House has probably heard. It was doubtless seen and felt that this bill was indefensible and involved enormous expenditures.

What will we do with 100,000 men in our Regular Army, unless we contemplate some aggression upon the people beyond the sea? No man dare pretend that they are intended simply for the United States to protect and maintain peace within our own borders. It is in aid of the policy of the Administration with respect to the annexation of the Philippine Islands and the depriving of the people there of their right to control their affairs in their own way that this unreasonable demand is made.

What is the meaning of this proposition now made that we shall take this monstrosity and gradually change it and cut it down in the course of the five-minute debate until in the end it shall emerge with a fixed Army of 50,000 men, with a kind of sliding scale to be operated by the President of the United States, in which he shall exercise his well-known powers of elasticity, increasing or diminishing the Army to suit his sovereign pleasure, any increase not to exceed 50,000 men additional? The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DOCKERY] is right. No President, I care not what his name may be, should be trusted in a time of peace with such a power as this, much less should any man be intrusted with it who is seeking to use it to wage a war against a people in the Orient to compel them to submit to a Government which they despise and repudiate.

Now, we all understand the significance and purpose of the proposed amendment to this bill. There is not a bit of practical difference between Congress arbitrarily fixing one hundred thousand as the maximum of the Regular Army and Congress fixing it at fifty thousand, and at the same time giving the President the right to enlarge it, so far as the size of the Army is concerned. In either event it means an army of 100,000 men—created in one case by the legislation of Congress and in the other created, to the extent of fifty thousand, by the will of the President of the United States. I am not willing to give him or to any other President in time of peace the power that might justly be conferred upon him in time of a great war. The truth is that this measure as originally framed can not be gotten through this House, and this change is being made in the expectation that it will make it acceptable. It will deceive nobody.

Why are not gentlemen frank as to the bill? Why do they not allow Congress to determine the size of the Regular Army? If we fix it too high, Congress at a subsequent session can reduce it; if too low, Congress at a subsequent session can increase it. We shall not have long to wait if amendment is needed. We are told now that there is a probability of a special session to assemble soon after this session adjourns. And if we do not have a special session this spring, the regular meeting of Congress will be held in less than one year from now. And if we should become, meanwhile, involved in foreign complications so as to render necessary an increase of the Army beyond the number now fixed by Congress, this body can be convened any time at the pleasure of the President.

Why should Congress abrogate its power? Why should Congress adjourn, giving the President authority, if no special session is called, to exercise these extraordinary powers—leaving him to pursue, uncontrolled by the action of an existing Congress, some policy which he may determine is right, but which the representatives of the people may think wrong and might arrest if they were in session? I am opposed to this surrender of Congressional power. I am opposed to surrendering our convictions and our prerogatives to the President, I care not who he may be.

There is another thing developed by the debate we have had here this morning, and that is that the Army is going to cost each year more than my friend from Iowa, chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs, stated the other day to the House.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana. I ask an extension of five minutes.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. I hope unanimous consent will be granted.

The CHAIRMAN. In the absence of objection, the gentleman from Indiana will proceed for five minutes more.

Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana. I do not charge the gentleman with intending to misrepresent, but I do charge him with displaying a lamentable lack of good judgment. I and all of us naturally look to him for information, because, as chairman of the committee having this measure in charge, he is presumed to have studied this subject. He ought to be able to give us information that we can rely upon.

Mr. HULL. Would not the gentleman depend on figures given by the War Department as to this question of cost?

Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana. That would depend entirely upon circumstances. If such figures were submitted, I would seek to test their correctness. I would not be contented with a mere statement. I would want an opportunity to cross-examine the gentleman who furnished them and to fortify myself with such pertinent general information as I might obtain, either by reading proper literature or by consulting gentlemen who were well informed on the subject.

The gentleman stated here the other day, in response to questions addressed to him, that according to his estimate this army of 100,000 would cost for its maintenance only $65,000,000 a year. I will grant (because I want to be perfectly fair) that he stated soon afterwards that this was a revision of his first figures, which he said made the amount $83,000,000 or $85,000,000. This shows the gentleman is not to be relied upon. [Laughter.] I do not say it unkindly, but it shows a wonderful change in computation in a short time. But I pass that by to notice what has been disclosed here to-day—the fact, which nobody now denies, that an army of 100,000 men will cost $100,000,000 a year. That has been conceded here this morning; there is no dispute about it. The progress of this day's debate, therefore, has been useful in at least one respect. We are beginning at last to get something like a correct basis on which to make our computations.

The debate this morning has developed something more. It has shown that an army of 100,000 men will cost more than $100,000,000 per year. Why do I say this? Because it has been conceded on the floor that the old method of computation as to the cost of maintaining a single soldier for a year fixed it at $1,000. But it leaks out that this computation is one which has been applied by the authorities in time of peace and before we had acquired any outlying possessions requiring the transportation there of large bodies of troops.

The gentleman [Mr. HULL] himself said the other day that one of the largest items in making up the sum total of the maintenance of an army was this matter of transportation, which was very costly. If, then, it has cost a thousand dollars per man to maintain our Army under the condition of affairs previously prevailing, when we had to make no transportation out of the United States, how much more will it cost to maintain each man in the army we are about to create, when transportation will be required over thousands of miles of water as well as within the borders of the United States?

So that instead of costing $100,000,000 a year, as is estimated for this army of 100,000 men, which is to be created by the joint action of Congress and the President of the United States, it will cost us considerably over that sum, and we must not lose sight of this fact.

Mr. DOCKERY. Will the gentleman from Indiana allow me a single suggestion?

Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana. Certainly.

Mr. DOCKERY. I am advised that the provisions of this bill would increase the pay of the Army 25 per cent to those who go abroad.

Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana. That simply verifies the fact that I have been endeavoring to state.

Now, Mr. Chairman, can we afford to take a leap in the dark in so important a matter as this, whether we are in favor or not in favor of an increase in the Army; whether we are in favor or not in favor of the President of the United States; whether we are or are not in favor of an expansion of our territory beyond its present boundaries? This is the all-important question.

This is the question that we must stop and consider, and should consider calmly and dispassionately, and not rush along recklessly and blindly with this legislation.

I imagine, Mr. Chairman, that by this time the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs [Mr. HULL] is willing to revise the opinion which he expressed on this floor when he was unfolding his bill, that we should "legislate for the present, and let the future look out for itself."

I insist, sir, that every indication shows us, and we must not be blinded to the facts, that an army of 100,000 men, such as would inevitably be raised under the provisions of the bill under consideration, whether the limit be fixed at 100,000 or at 50,000, with the increase to 50,000 additional left to the discretion of the President, will cost the people of the country, and they must put their hands in their pockets to raise the money for its payment, from $125,000,000 to $150,000,000 a year; and there are conscientious Representatives, I am sure, on this side of the Chamber who will rebel against such a proposition as this. For, gentlemen, you never will be able to go to your constituents and defend your records if you support such an expenditure.

Gentlemen around me say, "We will take care of that." Well, the people will take care of it, let me tell you.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Indiana may be permitted to have five minutes longer.

Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, I do not care for additional time now. I will probably occupy the floor again hereafter.

Mr. HULL. Mr. Chairman, I take the floor only for a moment to reply to the personal remarks of my amiable friend from Indiana [Mr. JOHNSON].

I read from the report of the committee, on page 18, the estimated cost of maintaining an army under the provisions of the Hull bill, which amounted to $40,013,246. In this estimate the increased cost of transportation is included, and is raised from $2,300,000 to $15,200,000, showing that the officers of the War Department did make a careful computation, and that the subject referred to by the gentleman from Indiana was included. I did make a mistake, of course, in the total amount involved, as I have already stated, and which amount has been corrected.

Now, I stated in the beginning of the debate that I had been too unwell to make all of the preparations and computations I had intended in reference to the subject and which I should have made.

The House knows that I was unable to take charge of the matter for some considerable time. The reports of the War Department I had not read in full, because I was not physically able to attend to it, and it was not published until after I left the city; and, as a matter of fact, I did not leave my room for three weeks after returning to Washington from Iowa.

It is not necessary that I should proceed further in that direction. But before taking my seat I wish to say a word further in reference to the cost of the Army, showing that the committee did not act unadvisedly. Let me say that the cost—the total cost amounting to some $82,000,000—was not a question of computation on my own part, but a question which the experts of the Department charged with the administration of the law had passed upon. They examined the question and figured out the actual cost. I simply gave the amounts which I had derived from these experts.

Now, in the very nature of things, gentlemen must understand that, to a certain extent at least, these must be estimates. The pay of the Army, the clothing, and all of that can be figured out absolutely; and it may be said in the same connection that the transportation can be figured out to almost an exact sum. But no one can be precisely correct in figures on that subject. There may be slight variances. And I want to say to this House, what my friend ought to know—what I believe he does know, for no keener intellect is on the floor—that the larger the army the less the expense per man. A small army, with its full complement of officers, costs more in proportion than a large army with practically the same complement of officers.

Not only that, but the absolute cost in the past has not been a thousand dollars per man, even when the Army was scattered through the Territories, with the enormous expense of transportation, far removed from railroads, where supplies had to be teamed for hundreds of miles. The cost has not been a thousand dollars per man when the officers commanded 25,000 men, while this bill provides for commanding a much larger number.

When the percentage of officers was greater than now, the cost was not a thousand dollars per man, and as you have increased your number of enlisted men without proportionately increasing your officers, you have reduced the sum per man, and I am willing to put the evidence which I received from the War Department against the unsupported statement of the gentleman from Indiana on a subject about which he confessedly knows nothing except in general terms—I am willing to take the evidence of experts, their statements under the responsibilities of their officers, that even with the increased expense by reason of the distance of these islands the total cost will not exceed $83,000,000, as against the gentleman's unsupported, wild statement that it will be $125,000,000 or $150,000,000.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, I had no intention of claiming the attention of the committee again to-day, if at all during the consideration of this bill, but the remarks of the gentleman from Indiana seem to me to justify me in saying a word.

No man has more respect for the ability of the gentleman on his feet and otherwise than I have. I have wished sometimes that his judgment was one-tenth part as good as his ability. If it were, we would not have the spectacle in the Committee of the Whole House to-day of the gentleman from Indiana receiving the plaudits of the other side of the House for saying that which no man upon that side of the House dare say.

Mr. SIMPSON. They dare say it, but could not say it as well as the gentleman from Indiana said it.

Mr. HULL. They dare say it, but would not.

Mr. CANNON. Now, the President of the United States needs no defense at my hands. I do not believe there is a man in this House, including the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. JOHNSON], who will pledge himself to speak truly, who will say that he would have had the President withdraw the navy or the army from the Philippines up to this time.

Mr. HANDY (from his seat). Oh, yes.

Mr. CANNON. Who is he?

Mr. HANDY (rising). I would have had him. [Manifestations of derision on the Republican side.]

Mr. CANNON. Is there one more? We will open an experience meeting here. Are there any more?

Mr. TODD. I have an amendment directing the President to withdraw the Army and Navy as soon as our Government has evidence of the formation of a republic of their own.

Mr. CANNON. Now, Mr. Chairman, they are there in a time of war. What is to be done in a time of peace when this treaty is ratified is to be done by the President, furnishing a military government until Congress speaks, and if that treaty is ratified before the 4th of March, the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. JOHNSON] and the minority and the majority of the House can have the right to speak and legislate, to call the Army away or make any disposition touching the Philippines that they may desire.

Now, let us be practical. I believe—and for that reason I am supporting this bill—I believe that the treaty that has been negotiated will be ratified, and ought to be. [Applause on the Republican side.] And when ratified, with our Army and Navy in possession, it will stay there until Congress otherwise provides. [Applause on the Republican side.] I am for it. What disposition will be made in the fullness of time God alone knows.

Mr. SIMPSON. And McKinley.

Mr. CANNON. The heart and the patriotism and the wisdom of this people and of that people will work it out. Now, the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. JOHNSON] says that it is going to cost something, a hundred or a hundred and twenty-five million dollars, to support this Army. I do not know how much it is going to cost. I hope we shall not have to have a greater number than 50,000. I hope that number will be enough. But for one I am not willing that this Congress should expire without provision being made that the President may have power to have 50,000 more if the national defense requires it. I am going to keep my skirts clear as well as I know how.

Ah, but the ghost of Cæsarism comes to the gentleman from Indiana. Why, we gave the President power without limit to call, not for 50,000 men, but 100,000, 200,000, 300,000, a million; to call for every fighting man in the United States of America if he desired. I believe the gentleman from Indiana did not vote for it, but all the balance of us, on both sides of the House, did. [Applause on the Republican side.] And yet they carp and criticise. Now, I did not get upon my feet for the purpose of saying unkind things of the gentleman from Indiana.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. HULL. Mr. Chairman, I ask that the gentleman's time be extended five minutes.

Mr. CANNON. I do not think I want so much. I do not want to weary the committee. [Cries of "Go on!"]

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa asks unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman from Illinois be extended five minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. CANNON. The gentleman has always had my respect, but I have felt called upon, in view of the line of his attack upon the President of the United States, the line of his attack upon what I conceive to be the Republican policy and the policy of the patriotic people of the United States, to say what I have said about his position, divorcing his position from his personality. Now, I think that is all I desire to say.

In conclusion, I will say, as I said before, it is a fact manifestly patent that the Republican side of the House have got to take this measure and, without fear, with the best wisdom that we can command to guide us, write it upon the statute books, so far as we are concerned, against the opposition of the great mass of the other side of the House, and for one I stand ready with my vote to help do it. [Loud applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. HAY. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. HAY. I will yield three minutes to the gentleman from Indiana.

Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana. I want a little more time.

Mr. HAY. Mr. Chairman, what I rose to say was not in any way to reflect on the remarks of the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. DOCKERY. Will the gentleman allow me to suggest the gentleman is going to touch upon a question of fact between him and the chairman of the committee as to the number of officers provided by this bill; and I hope every gentleman will give attention.

Mr. HAY. I simply arose to put into the RECORD the facts as to the number of officers which this bill will provide for. It provides for 3,781 officers. It provides for 18 generals, 582 cavalry officers, 620 artillery officers, 1,410 infantry officers, 25 in the Adjutant-General's Department, 19 in the Inspector-General's Department, 14 in the Advocate-General's Department, 122 in the Quartermaster's Department, 62 in the Commissary-General's Department, 601 in the Surgeon-General's Department, 61 in the Paymaster's Department, 208 engineer officers, 37 Signal Corps officers, and 2 officers in the Record and Pension Office. Now——

Mr. BOTKIN. Does that mean commissioned officers?

Mr. HAY. Yes; that means commissioned officers.

Mr. HULL. Will the gentleman confine himself to the line officers? The general statement was made that the staff is going to be materially reduced.

Mr. HAY. I do not know how you are going to do it. I hear the gentleman from Illinois get up here and stand by this bill and the gentleman from Iowa gets up and says that he is going to reduce the bill, and it seems to me that gentlemen on this side may come to the conclusion that they do not know what they are going to do about this bill. Perhaps they will show——

Mr. HULL. That is not fair. I know my colleague is a fair man, and I take pleasure in my service on the committee with him.

Mr. HAY. I am answering the question as to the number of officers.

Mr. HULL. I will say that the gentleman from Illinois and the gentleman from Iowa have both said that there is a substantial agreement in the majority of the committee about revising the staff so that it will conform more nearly to the force of 50,000 men. What the chairman of the committee was quoting was the officers in the line, not the staff, and the increase of line officers for the present Army. The proposed increase was simply those in the line of the Army, and included a lieutenant-general and all general officers.

Mr. HAY. If you strike out the staff, you have 2,700 in the line, 400 more than the chairman of the committee stated.

Mr. HULL. I said 2,599 in the line.

Mr. DOCKERY. Then it is true, as I understand from the gentleman, that 970 new officers of the line are created by this bill and about 636 staff officers?

Mr. HAY. Yes, sir; about that.

Now I yield to the gentleman from Indiana.

Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, I have always observed since a member of this House that when my very good friend from Illinois desires to attack a man he always commences by complimenting him. I knew very well after he uttered two or three sentences that he was going to put his weapon under my ribs; but, accustomed to that style of warfare all my life, I know very well how to meet it, and certainly I can find no fault with my good friend for resorting to this peculiar method of attack which I have so often parried and know well how to protect myself against.

When the gentleman talks about my having uttered sentiments that have not been uttered on the other side, I think he gives me credit for originality to which I do not wish to lay claim, for I have heard nothing but solemn protests from that side of the Chamber from the start against the policy of expansion and against the proposition to increase the Regular Army.

The gentleman asked whether or not I would be willing to have the Army and Navy withdrawn from Manila. I want to say to him that we will go farther back than the present with respect to the Manila question. The wrong was committed when the President of the United States created a commission and sent it to make a treaty of peace with Spain at Paris, with instructions to demand the cession to us of the Philippine Islands and to pay therefor the enormous sum of $20,000,000.

While I might not be willing right now to withdraw the Navy and Army from the Philippines immediately, I would withdraw them from menacing the republic of the Philippine Islands and from awakening in the breasts of the people there what I feel is a well-founded fear that the great Government of the United States is determined to annex the territory to the United States whether they wish it or not, and to thrust upon them against their opposition a government which is distasteful to them. That is the principle involved here, and we can not hide it.

The gentleman says the Army and Navy are in the Philippines in time of war. I say there is no actual war at all between the United States and any nation on the face of the globe. We are practically at peace with Spain, and she is powerless to renew the war. It is almost a stretch of the imagination to say that the legal status is that of war. Technically it may be so. The only danger of war arises from the fact that under the misguided policy of William McKinley, President of the United States, we may provoke to just resentment the people whose liberties are now threatened by the menace of this great Government. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

We are told—if gentlemen desire to interrupt me, the proper way to do it is to do it openly by asking me questions or by answering me on the floor—we are told by my friend that after the treaty of peace is ratified Congress may legislate on the subject. I do not doubt this; I knew as much before he made that remark. I never knew yet of an insidious effort or scheme to fasten certain measures upon a legislative body or upon the people that it was not, when resistance was made to it, suggested that the opposition should be delayed to some other time, and then it could be made just as well.

It is the same argument that is generally addressed to the man who is to receive the first blow and be put hors de combat, that he can fight after he has been knocked down. The time to expose this scheme is now. The time to call public attention to it is now. The time to resist it to the last is now, and I am not going to lose my right to be heard against this forging of the machinery for a colonial policy until all chances of resisting it successfully is gone.

I will cheerfully vote for a regular standing army to be fixed by authority of Congress, with no elastic scale for the President to use, but a sufficient number of men to garrison the United States, Hawaii, Porto Rico, and the island of Cuba, but not to be employed for extending our sway nearly to the shores of Asia and enslaving the people there.

The gentleman says we have heretofore given the President of the United States authority to raise a large army. I grant it, but this was in a time of war, or just before actual hostilities were commenced. I had no objection to that war measure. It is my recollection that I voted for it.

What does the gentleman mean by saying that he and others here voted on this floor for a war measure, and expressing uncertainty as to how my vote was cast? I opposed the Spanish war because I thought it unwise and unnecessary, and I have no apologies for my conduct; and yet at the same time, after the war was precipitated, there was not a war measure that I did not vote for cheerfully and patriotically.

I saw then only my imperiled country. I laid aside my private opinions and joined those who exerted their power and cast their votes in favor of a speedy and vigorous prosecution of the war. But now that the war is over and we are brought face to face with those troublesome, perplexing, and dangerous problems, which I foresaw would come as the result of the war, and which I therefore sought to escape by avoiding the war, I have the right, now that peace has returned, to do all that my conscience teaches me is necessary to prevent the injurious effects of the conflict from being inflicted upon our people and upon posterity.

I have a right to oppose—I would be derelict in my duty to myself and to my constituents if I did not oppose—here, as much as one humble individual can, a colonial policy such as has been the curse of every nation that ever attempted it, and which, if we persist in it, we and our posterity will regret in sackcloth and ashes.

Only one thing more and I am through. My friend says that he admires my ability in speech, but he goes on and disparages my judgment. I am one of those men who are willing to trust the soundness of their judgment, not to the passions and the prejudices of the hour, but to the calm, cool, and dispassionate "second sober thought," which always comes to a great and patriotic people when the brunt of an active conflict is over. The question whether my judgment in the position I have taken is right or wrong is one which can not be determined now. But there is coming a time soon in this country when I shall be willing to put my judgment against that of the gentleman from Illinois and let the people determine whether my judgment or his has been defective and at fault.

Mr. HILL. I understood the gentleman to invite questions.

Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana. I did not invite questions, but I very readily yield to my friend for a question.

Mr. HILL. I understand the gentleman to concede that the people of Porto Rico have just as much inherent right to self-government as the people of the Philippines; and yet he has stated that he would not object to a garrison in Porto Rico.

Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana. It is my distinct understanding that the people of Porto Rico have welcomed us to that island. I have not heard of their opposing our domination there. I will say to the gentleman, however, that I am opposed to the acquisition——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana. I must answer this question.

Mr. RIDGELY. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman have five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair hears no objection.

Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana. I am opposed to the acquisition of Cuba and Porto Rico, just as I was opposed to the acquisition of Hawaii, just as I am opposed to the annexation of the Philippines. I do not believe in acquiring territory outside of the United States. I thought I had made myself plain on that subject. But there is a different condition of affairs in Porto Rico, whose territory has been ceded to us——

Mr. HILL. How do you know that?

Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana. How does anybody know anything? [Laughter.] I know it from various reports in the daily papers, which have been uncontradicted. I know it from conversations I have had with people who knew something on this subject. And there is a distinction between a republic with arms in its hands standing ready to resist our aggression, as is the case to-day in the Philippines, and a country like Porto Rico, that welcomes our troops. But I say now that whenever the people of Porto Rico desire independence I will cast my influence and vote to grant it, for it is slavery to hold any people in subjection without their consent; and the Declaration of Independence is the best authority I care for on that subject.

One word more. Gentlemen say I am antagonizing the principles of the Republican party. My friend from Illinois saw fit to make that charge against me. It is an old dodge, to impugn a man's party fidelity and to read him out of the Republican party if he does not happen to subscribe to every little thing the managers of the party dictate and indorse every wrong they advocate. That game can not be played on me. I was born a Republican. I have been a Republican almost my entire life. I believe in the underlying principles of my party, but I am not a hide-bound partisan.

I do not believe that all the virtue and patriotism of this country are found inside the pale of my political organization. I do not believe that every portion of this country south of Mason and Dixon's line is wholly given up to treason and spoils. I comprehend with my ken and my heart the whole of my country; I am trying to legislate for it if I can, and I am not going to be whipped into line to support a Republican President when I believe he is wrong, when I believe that his conduct is inimical to the best interests of the American people.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. HULL. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. PAYNE reported that the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union having had under consideration the Army reorganization bill had come to no resolution thereon.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the time for taking the recess under the rule be extended five minutes.

There was no objection.

FORESTRY INVESTIGATION.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will lay before the House at this time a message from the President of the United States.

The message was read, as follows:

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

In accordance with a provision in the act making appropriations for the Department of Agriculture for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1899, I transmit herewith a report of the Secretary of Agriculture upon the forestry investigation and work of the Department of Agriculture.

WILLIAM McKINLEY.

EXECUTIVE MANSION, January 27, 1899.

The SPEAKER. The message and accompanying documents will be referred to the Committee on Agriculture.

PROMOTION OF COMMERCE.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, I desire to submit a report from the Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries, and desire to present it to the House, and that the minority may have leave also to file their views.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the title of the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 11312) to promote the commerce and increase the foreign trade of the United States and to provide auxiliary cruisers, transports, and seamen for Government use when necessary.

The SPEAKER. The bill and report will be referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. HANDY. I ask unanimous consent that the minority of the committee have leave until next Tuesday to file their views.

There was no objection.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. PLATT, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the Senate to House concurrent resolution No. 36, relating to furnishing one complete set of the Official Records of the Union and Confederate Armies to each Senator, Representative, and Delegate of the Fifty-fifth Congress not already entitled by law to receive the same.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed without amendment the bill (H. R. 11157) making appropriations for the payment of invalid and other pensions of the United States for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1900, and for other purposes.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. GAINES, for the balance of the day, on account of sickness.

To Mr. PEARSON, indefinitely, on account of important business.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CONNOLLY] will preside as Speaker pro tempore at the evening session to-night.

And then, on motion of Mr. PAYNE (at 5 o'clock and 2 minutes p. m.), the House took a recess until 8 o'clock p. m.

EVENING SESSION.

The recess having expired, the House (at 8 o'clock p. m.) was called to order by Mr. CONNOLLY as Speaker pro tempore, who directed the reading of the special order.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. TALBERT. Mr. Speaker, before a motion is made to go into Committee of the Whole to-night, I would like to make a statement and ask consent of the House as to a special order of business.

I see from the Calendar that there are only about 70 bills on it, 49 of which are removals of charges of desertion and of political disabilities, 8 for original pensions, and some 13 or 14 for increases. Now, I ask unanimous consent to pass over the bills for the removal of charges of desertion until we finish the pension bills, and then afterwards we can take up these cases of charges of desertion and consider them. I ask unanimous consent for that order.

Mr. RAY of New York. I hope that will be granted, Mr. Speaker. I see no objection to it.

I think, however, the gentleman is mistaken as to the number of bills for removing charges of desertion. I think there are only seven or eight.

Mr. TALBERT. That may be. I looked hurriedly over the Calendar.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The order asked for by the gentleman from South Carolina will be made, unless objection is entered.

There was no objection.

B. C. LOWE.

Mr. RAY of New York. Mr. Speaker, before submitting a motion to go into Committee of the Whole, there is, I think, a bill coming over as unfinished business from the last Friday session. I refer to the bill (H. R. 1279) granting a pension to Mrs. B. C. Lowe. There is an amendment pending, submitted by the chairman of the Committee on Pensions, to reduce the amount of the pension from $12 to $8 per month. I trust that amendment will be considered now and adopted. I move its adoption.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will read the amendment proposed by the gentleman from New York and by the Committee on Pensions.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out, in line 10, the word "twelve" and insert "eight;" so as to read: "pay her a pension at the rate of $8 a month."

The amendment was considered and agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

The title of the bill was amended to correspond.

On motion of Mr. RAY of New York, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. RAY of New York. Mr. Speaker, I now move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House for the purpose of considering business on the Private Calendar under the rule fixing Friday evening sessions of the House.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House, Mr. LACEY in the chair.

ALBERT S. SHEPARD.

The first business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 9979) granting an increase of pension to Albert S. Shepard.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and hereby is, authorized and directed to place upon the pension roll the name of Albert S. Shepard, who served during the late war in Company B, First Regiment of Massachusetts Cavalry, and pay him a pension of $24 per month in lieu of any pension now received by him.

The Committee on Invalid Pensions recommended the following amendments:

In line 4, after the word "roll," insert "subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws."

In line 5 strike out the words "who served during the late war in " and insert in lieu thereof the words "late of."

In line 7, after the word "pension," insert "at the rate."

At the end of line 7 strike out the word "any" and insert in lieu thereof the word "the."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the committee amendments.

Mr. TALBERT. Mr. Chairman, I do not make this motion for the purpose of consuming time, but I submit that the reports ought to be read and put upon record in these cases so as to show the reasons why these increases are granted. I presume that the members are not all in possession of the reports, and where the reports are not too long I would ask that they be read so that as we go along the RECORD will show why.

Mr. RAY of New York. Would it satisfy the gentleman to allow me to make a statement of the salient facts in each case, unless in some particular case he desires to have the report read in full?

Mr. TALBERT. Why, certainly, that would cover the ground.

Mr. RAY of New York. And have unanimous consent that the report be printed in the RECORD, whenever you desire it?

Mr. TALBERT. Well, a short statement would satisfy us. That could go into the RECORD. My idea is not to consume time, but I think the RECORD ought to show the reasons for our action. I think most of these bills are meritorious. I am willing to vote for them upon the statement of the chairman. Where the reports are long, I will not ask for their reading, but a short statement of the reasons will be sufficient.

Mr. RAY of New York. If they are not satisfactory, then of course I will not ask that the bills be passed by this House, and so far as I am concerned, I would not consent to their being reported to the House, and would come here and fight a bill that I did not believe to be meritorious.

Now, I will state this case. This soldier served from August, 1862, to November, 1864, when he was honorably discharged. He has exhausted his remedy at the Bureau. He has hemorrhage of the lungs, disease of the heart and kidneys, has lost a part of his hand, and has stiffness of the hand and can not perform any labor at all. He is very, very poor.

Mr. GIBSON. And confined to his bed.

Mr. RAY of New York. He is confined to his bed permanently. He is old and can live but a little time. He has no property and no wife, children, or relatives upon whom he can depend for support. Rather than have this old man, who served nearly four years as a soldier, go to the almshouse, we report an increase of pension to $24 a month, which, it must be admitted, is reasonable.

The amendments recommended by the committee were agreed to.

The bill as amended was laid aside to be reported to the House with a favorable recommendation.

MAZIE V. SULLIVAN.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 10285) granting an increase of pension to Mazie V. Sullivan.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension roll the name of Mazie V. Sullivan, widow of George R. Sullivan, late of Company G, Eleventh Maryland Volunteer Infantry, and to pay her a pension of $30 per month, in lieu of that which she is now receiving.

The Committee on Invalid Pensions recommended the following amendments:

In line 4, after the word "roll," insert "subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws."

In line 7 strike out the words "of twenty" and insert in lieu thereof the words "at the rate of twelve."

Mr. RAY of New York. Mr. Chairman, this lady, who is a very worthy lady, resides in this city. She is drawing a pension of $8 a month, which it is proposed to increase to $12. She is the widow of George R. Sullivan, who served faithfully and long in the war. He never filed a claim for a pension, and it can not be proved that his death was due to his military service. Hence, under the law, she can draw but $8. Now, she is very poor. She was afflicted with a cancerous growth on her right hand, in consequence of which the hand was amputated, and since then her whole system seems to be involved. She has no means of support excepting her pension, and the only child that she has is sick and confined permanently in the hospital. Therefore, we give her $4 increase.

The amendments recommended by the committee were agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be laid aside to be reported to the House with a favorable recommendation.

WILLIAM B. MATCHETT.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 835) granting a pension to William B. Matchett.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of William B. Matchett, chaplain of the Tenth Regiment of New York Volunteers, at the rate $30 per month, from and after the passage of this act.

The Committee on Invalid Pensions recommended the following amendments:

In line 7, after the word "Volunteers," insert "and pay him a pension."

In line 7 strike out the word "twenty" and insert in lieu thereof the word "twelve."

Strike out all after the word "month," in line 8.

Mr. RAY of New York. Mr. Chairman, Mr. Matchett served nearly all through the war as chaplain of a regiment. Owing to his being in active service, or for some other reason, he did not actually get mustered in, but he served nearly all through the war. He is now an old man and is poor. The Senate, in the Fifty-third Congress, passed a bill granting this claimant a pension of $20 a month, but it was not reached in the House.

In both the Fifty-third and Fifty-fourth Congresses bills were reported from the committee of this House giving this man a pension, I think, but am not sure, in each case, of $20 a month. This committee did not think it proper to give him over $12, and we have therefore reported the bill at $12 a month. The reason why he can not get a pension at the Bureau is because of the technicality of his not having been mustered in.

The committee amendments were agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be laid aside to be reported to the House with a favorable recommendation.

JOHN GREEN.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (S. 1183) for the relief of John Green.

The bill was read, as follows:

Whereas John Green, late a private in Troop C, Fourth Regiment United States Cavalry, in said service incurred a fracture of left thigh; and

Whereas the continuance and permanency of said injury is due to malpractice by the medical officer of the United States placed in charge of his case: Therefore,

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the claim of the said John Green for pension, the same being original invalid No. 736714, for fracture of left thigh, be given a pensionable status and adjudicated in accordance with the indorsement of his company officers, made upon his discharge, that the same was received in line of duty, the same to be rated in accordance with the rules and limitations of the pension law.

The amendment recommended by the committee was read, as follows:

Strike out the second paragraph of the preamble.

Strike out all after the enacting clause, and insert the following:

"That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed, in adjudicating the pension claim of John Green, late of Troop C, Fourth United States Cavalry to accept disability as having been incurred in line of duty, and thereupon to place the name of said John Green on the pension roll, subject to all other provisions and limitations of the pension laws, such pension, when granted, to date from the approval of this act."

Mr. RAY of New York. Mr. Chairman, I would like to say to the gentleman from South Carolina, if he asks it the Clerk will have to read the report in this case, because the next three or four cases come from the Committee on Pensions, and I do not have the reports before me.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendments of the committee.

Mr. TALBERT. Mr. Chairman, I would like to have the report read.

The CHAIRMAN. The report will be read.

The report (by Mr. SHELDEN) is as follows:

The Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1183) granting a pension to John Green, have considered the same and report:

A House bill for the relief of this applicant was before your committee at the first session of the Fifty-fourth Congress, and the favorable report thereon, fully setting forth the facts, is adopted by your committee as their report, and the bill is returned with the recommendation that it do pass, amended, however, as follows: Amend the title so as to read: "A bill granting a pension to John Green."

This is a bill enacting that John Green be granted a pension on account of a fracture of left thigh, received while serving as a private in Troop C, Fourth United States Cavalry. He enlisted February 7, 1888, and was discharged October 19, 1889, because of disability arising from said injury.

In his application for pension, filed November 2, 1889, he alleged that at Fort Bowie, Ariz., about February 15, 1889, he incurred a fracture of left thigh by being crushed between a wood pile and a cart while on fatigue duty hauling wood.

The claimant was undergoing punishment by being confined under guard at hard labor for the period of one month at the time of receiving the injury. His offense was becoming intoxicated and using bad language in the reading room of the troop, and because he was under sentence of court-martial at the time of incurring the injury the Pension Bureau held that he was not in line of duty and rejected his claim.

Notwithstanding the adverse view of the case taken by the Pension Bureau, the claimant's commanding officers had recorded the accident as having been received in line of duty.

The muster rolls of the troop from February 28, 1889, to August 31, 1889, report claimant "Present; sick (at Fort Bowie, Ariz.) since February 21, 1889. Simple fracture of left femur, contracted in line of duty." The hospital records show that he was treated from February 15 to October 19, 1889, for "simple oblique fracture of left femur (middle third), caught between a cart wheel and a wood pile while on fatigue in line of duty."

In the certificate of disability upon which the claimant was discharged First Lieut. H. J. McGrath, commanding the troop, certifies that "on February 15, 1889, this man had his left leg broken by having it crushed between a cart and wood pile, the injury being received in line of duty."

A similar indorsement was made on the certificate by L. C. Touey, acting assistant surgeon, United States Army.

The claimant's discharge certificate, which is on file with the papers, states that his character is good.

A medical examination by a Washington (D. C.) board, January 27, 1890, found a "fracture of left thigh, middle third: result, bad. The upper fragment overrides the lower to such an extent that the extremity is shortened. There is angular deformity formed. Altogether a bad limb (large mass of callus at seat of fracture). * * * Walks very lame, leaning on a cane."

The degree of disability found by the board was seventeen-eighteenths.

The claimant is in indigent circumstances and an inmate of the Soldiers' Home at Washington.

Your committee do not believe that the offense for which the claimant was undergoing punishment at the time he received his injury was sufficiently great to deny him a pension for injuries incurred while actually engaged in fatigue duty, and hence the favorable recommendation herein made is believed to be just and proper.

Mr. TALBERT (during the reading). I ask that the further reading of the report be dispensed with.

The amendments of the committee were agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be laid aside with a favorable recommendation.

MRS. LETITIA TYLER SEMPLE.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (S. 1776) to increase the pension of Mrs. Letitia Tyler Semple.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension roll the name of Letitia Tyler Semple, widow of the late James A. Semple, a paymaster of the United States Navy, at the rate of $50 per month, in lieu of the pension she is now receiving.

The amendment recommended by the committee was read, as follows:

In line 6 strike out the word "fifty" and insert "twenty."

Mr. LAMB. Mr. Chairman, anticipating my friend from South Carolina, I will ask that this report be read; it is a short one, and explains the situation fully to the House.

The report (by Mr. LOUDENSLAGER) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1776) granting an increase of pension to Letitia Tyler Semple, have considered the same and report:

The bill is accompanied by Senate Report No. 635, second session of the present Congress, and from it the facts set forth below are taken:

"The following letters from the claimant and Hon. THOMAS S. MARTIN, a Senator from Virginia, explain the grounds upon which an increase of pension is asked in this case, and also clearly set forth the necessities of the claimant. Mrs. Semple wrote, under date of April 20, 1897, as follows to Senator VEST:

"WASHINGTON, D. C., April 20, 1897.

"Hon. GEORGE G. VEST,
"United States Senator from Missouri.

"SIR: I will not occupy your time longer than is absolutely necessary in bringing a matter before you of much interest to myself, and in which I ask your sympathy.

"With Mrs. Vest I have the pleasure of a slight acquaintance. I have not the honor to have met you, but as Missouri is a daughter of Virginia, I do not hesitate to call upon you, one of her noble sons, to extend me kind consideration.

"Very recently (in the month of February) your body, the Senate, granted to Mrs. Dandridge, a daughter of Gen. Zachary Taylor, the President of the United States, an increase of pension on the life of her first husband, Colonel Bliss, U. S. A. This is a second time an increase has been granted to her. My object in writing is to say to you that I draw a Mexican war pension for the services rendered by my husband, Paymaster James A. Semple, U. S. N., which has never been increased from $8 per month.

"Mrs. Dandridge and myself stand toward a President of the United States in the same position, my father being John Tyler, of Virginia. I ask that you obtain for me the same increase of pension that Mrs. Dandridge receives, for at all points we stand alike, save that she has married again, and that I represent four Presidents. James Monroe, William Henry Harrison, John Tyler, and Benjamin Harrison were cousins through the Armisteads and Tylers of Virginia.

"My necessity must plead with you for me, inasmuch as the $8 pension from the Mexican war is the only income whatever I have, and this amount is inadequate for my necessities. I therefore most respectfully ask your intercession in my behalf. I will close my letter with this fact: That after the death of my mother, September, 1842, upon the invitation of the President, I assumed the duties of the lady of the White House and performed them to the satisfaction of all.

"With sentiments of very high consideration and respect,

"I am, yours,

"LETITIA TYLER SEMPLE.

"LOUISE HOME, Washington, D. C."

The letter of Senator MARTIN is as follows:

UNITED STATES SENATE,
Washington, D. C., December 14, 1897.

MY DEAR SIR: On the 23d of April, 1897, I introduced a bill (S. 1776) to increase the pension of Mrs. Letitia Tyler Semple.

Mrs. Semple is the widow of the late James A. Semple, a paymaster in the United States Navy, and as such is receiving a small pension on account of the service of her late husband in the Mexican war.

The bill provides for an increase to $100 per month. At the time I introduced the bill I had a conversation with you in which you stated you thought $100 too much, but an increase to $50 per month perhaps might be proper.

While I rest the claim of Mrs. Semple on the fact that she is the widow of a soldier in the Mexican war, I will say that her case has appealed strongly to my sympathy because of her greatly changed circumstances and her poverty in her old age.

Besides being the widow of an officer, she is the daughter of the late President John Tyler, of Virginia, and as such was once the mistress of the White House. Now, in her extreme old age (I think she is about 80 years old, though I do not undertake to speak with entire accuracy as to that, but for greater accuracy I refer you to a letter she wrote me and which I mailed you, I think, during the last session of Congress) she is an inmate of the Louise Home in this city, having not a dollar's worth of property of any kind. She is a refined and accomplished lady in every respect, and this small increase in her pension will alleviate her condition during the few remaining years of her life.

I believe a Mrs. Dandridge, to whom an increase of pension was given, stood in like case as this one of Mrs. Semple.

Yours, very truly,

THOMAS S. MARTIN.

Hon. JACOB GALLINGER,
Chairman Pension Committee, United States Senate.

There are many precedents for the allowance of an increase of pension to the aged and needy widows of old war soldiers, and in the light of the facts related above the passage of the bill is recommended, with an amendment striking out the word "fifty," in line 6, and inserting in lieu thereof the word "twenty," so as to fix the rate of pension at $20 per month.

Mr. LAMB. Now, Mr. Chairman, I will detain the committee but a few moments. I ask that this amendment be voted down. I think that this worthy lady, the only living daughter of President Tyler, of Virginia, by his first marriage, ought to be granted this pension that was agreed upon by the Senate committee.

Mr. GIBSON. I would like to ask the gentleman if her mother is living?

Mr. LAMB. No, sir; this lady is about 80 years of age.

Mr. GIBSON. Is President Tyler's wife living?

Mr. LAMB. His last wife is also dead. President Tyler was twice married, and there were two sets of children. This is the only surviving child by the first marriage. I visit her in the Louise Home. She is about 80 years old and totally blind. She writes to me sometimes, but it is through an amanuensis. Recently she has had an operation performed on her eyes at some considerable expense. How she obtained the money I do not know, but presume it must have been through the kindness of some of her friends.

President Tyler left the Executive Mansion poorer than he came to it, and left very small estate at his death. I appeal to you, gentlemen, to give to this lady the pension that is granted as the bill passed the Senate. She will not live long. Her position is shown in the letter I have had read. Therefore, I ask that the amendment recommended by the committee be voted down and that she be given $50 a month.

Mr. RAY of New York. Mr. Chairman, that ought not to be done, but so far as I am concerned, I would have no objection whatever to amending the bill to make it $30 a month. That would be in accord with what the Senate has done and what the House has invariably done in the case of a daughter of a soldier.

Mr. LAMB. She was the widow of a naval officer and also the daughter of a President. She was the widow of Captain Semple, who was in the Navy.

Mr. RAY of New York. She is the widow of a naval officer. So far as I am concerned, I should be willing to give her $30 a month instead of $20, which will be in line with what the committee has done in similar cases; but it would not be right, it would not be just to others, or in line with what the committee has done to do differently here than has been done in every case of like character.

Mr. MANN. I would like to ask the gentleman if, when he refers to cases of like character, he refers to cases where the claimant was the daughter of an ex-President.

Mr. RAY of New York. Well, Mr. Chairman, I would say to the gentleman that there is no law and never has been under which we gave pension, or should pension, to daughters of Presidents or of ex-Presidents, so that we have had no cases of that kind or character, and no pension should be granted upon that ground.

Mr. LAMB. There is the case of Mrs. Dandridge, the daughter of President Zachary Taylor. I will say, in reply to my friend, if I could have been before the committee at the time this bill was passed on and made a statement, that more than likely the committee would have agreed to the Senate report. I think so, but I was called away that day and was not before the committee.

Mr. RAY of New York. Mr. Chairman, I move that the amendment proposed by the committee be amended by substituting "thirty" for "twenty."

Mr. LAMB. I hope that will be voted down, and give us the $50 we ask.

Mr. RAY of New York. You would be sure to get your bill if you do that, and you will be sure not to get it if you do not.

Mr. ARNOLD. Mr. Chairman, it seems to me a lady of this age, about 80 years, likely to live but a very short time, the widow of a deceased naval officer, and in addition to that the daughter of a President of this great country—that it is not a question of law, but a question of national pride, and I shall vote for $50.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, there is no one in this House for whom I have so great a respect in his judgment as to pensions as the gentleman from New York, chairman of the Committee on Invalid Pensions. But it does seem to me in this case the United States can well afford not to split hairs upon a matter of this kind, and where we grant pensions of $50 a month in many cases, and even of a hundred dollars a month in some cases, that we might well strain a point, if necessary, and grant to the widow of a naval officer, the daughter of a President of the United States, in her old age, when she is blind and is on the side of life that will soon end, at least $50; and I hope every amendment for less than that may be voted down.

Mr. MORRIS. Mr. Chairman, I happen to know something about the peculiar circumstances of this lady's case. Indeed, she and her people are old and long-standing friends of both my father's and my mother's family. This lady, the daughter of John Tyler, President of the United States, was born in the city of Williamsburg, Va. She was a young woman, the wife of a naval officer of the United States, and her mother having died while her father was President, she was called by her father to preside at the White House, at least, for a time. The ravages of war destroyed all the property of her people, and the end of the war found her absolutely without means.

The great charity which was established here by Mr. Corcoran, who made his fortune in this city, has given her an asylum in her old age. She is nearly, as I recollect, 80 years of age. Now, Mr. Chairman, it does seem to me that a case of this sort appeals to members of this House with peculiar force. It is a peculiar spectacle for the people of the United States to behold a woman, the daughter of an ex-President of the United States, who has presided in the White House, looking out of the window of a charitable institution upon the scenes of her former magnificence.

It does seem to me that this is a most peculiar case, appealing to the sympathy of every member of this House, and I hope this Congress will not split hairs upon $10 a month or $20 a month, but will give this lady the full sum of $50 a month, for which the bill was originally drawn. It is a very small matter. I have the highest respect for my friend from New York [Mr. RAY]; but it does seem to me that in a case of such peculiar circumstances as this, this Congress might afford to be thus liberal.

Mr. RAY of New York. Mr. Chairman, this country of ours contains here and there many people who in their old age and adversity are looking out, in the language of the gentleman from Minnesota, upon the scenes of their former magnificence, or the scenes of the former magnificence of their country.

There are more than a million surviving heroes of the late civil war and about 700,000 of them are on the pension rolls, and they are growing older every day, and there are thousands of them suffering from wounds which absolutely disable them from performing any labor and who are very poor. There are hundreds, and I may say thousands, of them who were brave and gallant officers of high rank who are to-day without a penny, and they in their necessity come knocking at the doors of Congress for special relief.

We also have thousands upon thousands of widows of officers and private soldiers who served three and four and five years. Their husbands are gone, their sons are gone, daughters gone; they are simply objects of charity. And what do we give them? The general law in their old age and necessity gives them, if the husband died of a disease or disability not contracted in the service, $8 per month. If the disease or disability was contracted in the service, it is $12 per month.

In their old age and adversity and necessity, with the doors of the poorhouse wide open before them, they come for relief, and what do we do? In case of the widow of an officer, old, blind, and very poor, we have given them an increase of $14, $16, $18, $24, and $30, and it is stopped at that. Only $30 in the case of the highest officer, unless the death of the husband was the result of service in the Army, when $50 per month has been the limit.

Now, we have on the Calendar here to-night 50 pension bills. The claimants are old, poor, and in necessitous circumstances, excepting two or three, who are poor, helpless children. We have four or five cases of officers' widows—old, poor, and in necessitous circumstances. There are hundreds more that I know of, and I do not know but 500 more, because there are something like 3,000 bills that we have not had time to examine; and when we remember that the poverty and necessities of these classes are increasing we ought to be careful and cautious and so proceed that we may grant some help to all, extravagant pensions to none.

There is not anything sentimental that can be said in the one case that can not be said in all. We ought to be consistent in this legislation, so that all pensioners and all claimants coming before this Congress may say that we do by one as we do by another in like circumstances and under similar conditions. We certainly should not travel outside the line and undertake to pension either the children or the brothers or the sisters or the relatives of ex-Presidents. That would lead us to the pensioning of the wives and children and sisters of Senators and Members of Congress and civil officers of all kinds.

Mr. Chairman, it is an ungracious task for me to be here to-night defending the action and report of the Committee on Pensions, of which Mr. LOUDENSLAGER is chairman. I knew nothing of this report until it came up to-night. I never had heard of the case unless it may have been casually mentioned. The chairman of the committee that reported the bill is not here, but the bill is here, and I know what the action of the Committee on Invalid Pensions has been in cases of this kind; I know what this House has decided it should be.

I know what the Senate has said its action should be in like cases. Under such circumstances and with such facts before us, it seems to me there is no justification whatever for passing this bill at a higher rate than $30 a month. As I understand it, this lady now gets only——

A MEMBER. Eight dollars a month.

Mr. RAY of New York. Eight dollars a month, which is the highest sum the law allows her; and if this Committee of the Whole should assent to the amendment and raise the pension from $8 to $30, it will certainly give this old lady enough to afford her reasonable care for the rest of her days. If you go beyond that in this case, then, to be consistent, you should go beyond it in other cases which will come before us to-night, cases similar in all respects to this, except that the Presidential element is not in them. Therefore it is that I have moved the amendment.

Mr. SULLOWAY. Mr. Chairman, I do not rise to address myself to the Committee of the Whole on this subject. I want to call attention simply to a single statement made by the chairman of the committee to which I belong. He says that to be consistent with the Senate we should adopt his amendment. This is a Senate bill. It has been passed by the Senate and comes here for our concurrence. Therefore there is involved no such question as the gentleman from New York undertakes to raise. I hope this lady will get $50 a month.

Mr. RAY of New York. The gentleman from New Hampshire [Mr. SULLOWAY] should not have made all of the statement he has just made, because he is aware that the Senate has adopted an iron-clad rule for cases of this kind—possibly since they passed this bill; I do not know how that is. They have sent to our committee a copy of that rule with others. Under that rule they treat all House bills in the same way, saying that in such cases they will not go beyond $30 a month.

Mr. JETT. What amount has been allowed by the Senate in this case?

Several MEMBERS. Fifty dollars.

The amendment of Mr. RAY of New York to the amendment of the committee was rejected; and the amendment of the committee was rejected.

The bill was then laid aside to be reported favorably to the House.

The Committee on Invalid Pensions recommend that the title of the bill be changed to read, "A bill granting an increase of pension to Harriet Tubman Davis."

Mr. TALBERT. Mr. Chairman, I would like to have the report in that case read.

Mr. RAY of New York. If the gentleman will permit me, I will make a brief statement, which may cover the point.

Mr. TALBERT. That will be satisfactory.

Mr. RAY of New York. Mr. Chairman, this bill was introduced by the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE], my colleague, who sits here.

This pensioner is now drawing the sum of $8 a month, and we propose to increase it to $25 a month. She was the widow of Nelson Davis, who served in Company G, Eighth United States Infantry, from September, 1863, to November, 1865, and was honorably discharged. She also served long and faithfully as an army nurse. She acted as a nurse in the hospital, as a cook in the hospital, and as courier or messenger and spy during the whole period of the war. There is a letter accompanying the report from Hon. William H. Seward, which refers to her services, and there are also letters from other officers of high rank in the service, attesting her faithfulness and her efficiency.

She is now old and very poor, and an object of charity, unless the pension is increased.

Mr. TALBERT. She is getting pensioned as a widow, then, and also as a nurse?

Mr. RAY of New York. No; only as a widow. She is about 75 years of age, I may add, as I remember the testimony.

Mr. JETT. What does the bill provide for her?

Mr. RAY of New York. An increase of from $8 to $25 per month.

The bill was considered, and was laid aside to be reported to the House with a favorable recommendation.

Litzenberg, late second lieutenant in Company I, Eighty-eighth Regiment Ohio Volunteer Infantry, and pay her a pension of $30 a month.

The committee recommend the adoption of the following amendments:

Line 4, after "roll," insert "subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws."

Line 7, after "pension," insert "at the rate."

In line 8 strike out "thirty" and insert in lieu thereof "twenty-five."

Amend the title so as to read: "A bill granting an increase of pension to Elizabeth V. Litzenberg."

The amendments were considered and agreed to.

The bill as amended was laid aside to be reported to the House with a favorable recommendation.

Evans, late of Company C, Twenty-eighth Iowa Infantry Volunteers, at the rate of $50 per month, in lieu of the pension he is now receiving, and subject to the limitations of the general pension laws.

The Committee on Invalid Pensions recommended the following amendments:

In line 4 strike out "invalid."
In line 4, after "roll," insert "subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws."
In line 6, after "Volunteers," insert "and pay him a pension."
Strike out all after "receiving," in line 7, and all of line 8.

Mr. RAY of New York. Mr. Chairman, I should like to say that this was an old soldier who served long and faithfully. He was honorably discharged. He received terrible wounds, for which he is drawing a pension. In addition to this, some years after his service closed a piece of gun cap was found in one of his eyes, which had always troubled him. Soon after this a cancer began to develop near the eye upon his nose.

He claims that this cancer was the result of that piece of gun cap being in his eye. The Pension Bureau found against him. But the cancer has developed and extended until it has eaten out both his eyes, and we have a photograph on file in the committee room showing the spread of this cancerous growth over his face, almost as large as your two hands. He can live only a short time. It is for these reasons that we give him $50 a month.

The amendments recommended by the committee were agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be laid aside to be reported to the House with a favorable recommendation.

JAMES WEBB.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 10056) increasing the pension of James Webb.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension roll the name of James Webb, late a private of Company F, Ninth Regiment of Tennessee Cavalry, and pay him a pension at the rate of $50 a month, in lieu of the pension he is now receiving.

The Committee on Invalid Pensions recommended the following amendments:

Line 4, after "roll," insert "subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws."
Line 7, strike out "fifty" and insert "forty."

Mr. TALBERT. Mr. Chairman, I should like to ask the chairman of the Committee on Invalid Pensions to explain why, in this and other bills, you use the words "subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws," and then fix the amount of the pension. If he has a pensionable status, why should he not go to the Pension Bureau and get his pension?

Mr. RAY of New York. He does not have a pensionable status at the rate reported by the committee. He has been to the Bureau and exhausted his remedy. He served long, honorably, and faithfully, and was captured, and he has disabilities of service origin which entitle him to the amount of money that the Bureau give him, but because of disabilities, partially of service origin, mostly arising since, he is now absolutely paralyzed and helpless. He is old and very poor. He has no one upon whom he can depend for support. Therefore we increase his pension for his few remaining days; to take care of him and keep him out of the poorhouse.

Mr. TALBERT. Why do you say "subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws?"

Mr. RAY of New York. We always put those words in a bill, even when we fix the rate.

Mr. TALBERT. Then I do not see that the words have any meaning.

Mr. RAY of New York. The Pension Bureau is organized, and it has its rulings and provisions of law providing for the payment of pensions quarterly, and so forth, and this phrase is for the protection of the Government.

Mr. TALBERT. So this man has been there and can not get this increase?

Mr. RAY of New York. Certainly not; because these additional disabilities are not of service origin.

Mr. TALBERT. Not traceable to service origin?

Mr. RAY of New York. No; but the words "subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws" are put in so as to authorize the Commissioner of Pensions to pay his pension according to the rules and regulations fixed by law and the Pension Bureau, so they will have a right to insist that he execute a voucher when he draws his pension, and in other respects comply with the law.

We put that in all bills, whether the introducer of the bill puts it in or not. If we should leave it out the Senate would put it in. We always put it in their bills, so as to have pensions paid under the provisions of existing law, except that in many cases we fix the amount.

The amendments recommended by the committee were agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be laid aside to be reported to the House with a favorable recommendation.

JOHN W. OHNGEMACH.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 5802) granting a pension to John W. Ohngemach, of Friend, county of Saline, Nebr.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws of the United States, the name of John W. Ohngemach, late of Company E, Second Regiment Colorado Volunteer Cavalry, and pay him a pension at the rate of $50 per month.

The amendments recommended by the committee were read, as follows:

From lines 5 and 6 strike out "of the United States."
From line 8 strike out the word "fifty" and insert in lieu thereof the word "thirty."
At the end of line 8 add the following: "in lieu of that he is now receiving."
Amend the title so as to read: "A bill granting an increase of pension to John W. Ohngemach."

Mr. TALBERT. I would like to ask the gentleman how much he is receiving now?

Mr. RAY of New York. He is receiving $17 a month. He is totally blind. He lost one eye in the service and lost the other since.

Mr. TALBERT. He would have gotten much more if he had a pensionable status at the Bureau.

Mr. RAY of New York. He has a pensionable status at the Bureau, but he can not trace his blindness to service origin. He gets $17 a month now for other disabilities, but nothing on account of his blindness. He can not trace that to service origin, but still he is blind. He rendered long and faithful service, is old and poor, and therefore we increase it from $17 a month to $30 on account of the blindness, and he could not get that, mind you, at the Pension Bureau, because all his disabilities are not of service origin.

The amendments of the committee were agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be laid aside with a favorable recommendation.

GEORGE BLAKESLEY.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 9234) increasing the pension of George Blakesley.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, directed to place upon the pension roll, subject to the restrictions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of George Blakesley, late of Company A, One hundred and eighty-ninth New York Volunteer Infantry, and Company D, One hundred and sixty-first New York Volunteer Infantry, and pay him a pension of $30 per month in lieu of the pension he is now receiving.

The amendments of the committee were read, as follows:

In line 4 strike out "restrictions" and insert in lieu thereof the word "provisions."
In lines 8 and 9 strike out "of thirty" and insert in lieu thereof "at the rate of twenty-four."

Mr. RAY of New York. Now, I will say to the gentleman from South Carolina that this is the father of three soldiers, two killed in battle and the third died in the Army. He is now approaching 70 years of age and very poor. We think he is entitled to be kept out of the poorhouse, and therefore increase his pension.

The amendments of the committee were agreed to.

Bowen, late captain in the United States Volunteers, and that he pay him a pension of $35 per month in lieu of all other pension.

The amendments recommended by the committee were read, as follows:

Line 7, after "pension," insert "at the rate."
Line 8, strike out "of all other pensions" and insert "the pension he now receives."
Amend the title so as to read: "A bill granting an increase of pension to John J. Bowen."

The amendments of the committee were agreed to.

The amendments recommended by the Committee were read, as follows:

In line 4 strike out "upon" and insert "on."
After "roll," line 4, insert "subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws."
In line 7 strike out all after "volunteers" and insert "and pay her a pension at the rate of $12 per month."

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (S. 943) granting a pension to Jane B. Johnston.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Jane B. Johnston, an army nurse at Government Hospital, Throggs Neck, N. Y., during the war of the rebellion, and pay her a pension of $12 per month.

Mr. TALBERT. Mr. Chairman, I would like to have the report read in that case. I never heard of that place before.

Mr. RAY of New York. Is that the reason why the gentleman wants the report read?

Mr. TALBERT. A statement by the gentleman will do as well, or better.

Mr. RAY of New York. It is Throggs Neck, not Frogs Neck. Frogs do not have much neck, although they frequently "get it in the neck;" but this is Throggs Neck. It is a place up in New York where troops were stationed during the war, and there were large numbers of them there. This lady went there and served a long time as a nurse during the war between the States. She is now old and poor, but she rendered faithful and valuable service. She was not employed, however, by authority that was recognized at the War Department, but they accepted her service.

Mr. TALBERT. Let her have a pension.

Mr. RAY of New York. For that reason she could not get it at the Bureau.

The bill was ordered to be laid aside with a favorable recommendation.

EVA W. BRANNAN.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (S. 717) granting an increase of pension to Eva W. Brannan, widow of the late Maj. Gen. John Milton Brannan, United States Army.

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Eva W. Brannan, widow of the late Maj. Gen. John Milton Brannan, United States Army, at the rate of $50 per month, which pension shall be in lieu of the pension she is now receiving.

The amendments recommended by the committee were read, as follows:

Line 6, strike out "Major-General" and insert "Brigadier-General."
Line 7, strike out "Army" and insert "Volunteers."

The amendments of the committee were agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be laid aside with a favorable recommendation.

MARGARET LOVE SKERRETT.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (S. 4246) granting an increase of pension to Margaret Love Skerrett.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Margaret Love Skerrett, widow of Joseph S. Skerrett, late rear-admiral, United States Navy (retired), and pay her a pension at the rate of $50 per month in lieu of that she is now receiving.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with a favorable recommendation.

MARY LUELLA STEELE.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 6810) for the relief of Mary Luella Steele.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place upon the pension roll the name of Mary Luella Steele, dependent daughter of James H. Steele, late orderly sergeant of Company B, Forty-eighth Missouri Infantry Volunteers, and pay her a pension of $30 per month.

The committee amendments were as follows:

Line 5, after the word "Steele," insert "the permanently helpless and."
Strike out all after the word "pension," line 8, and insert in lieu thereof the following: "at the rate of $12 per month."

The committee amendments were considered, and agreed to.

The bill as amended was laid aside to be reported to the House with a favorable recommendation.

JOSEPH H. M'GEE.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place the name of Joseph H. McGee, late major First Missouri State Militia Cavalry, on the pension roll, subject to its provisions and limitations, and pay him a pension at the rate of $40 per month in lieu of the pension he is now receiving.

The amendments recommended by the committee were as follows:

After "place," in line 4, insert "upon the pension roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws."
From lines 5 and 6 strike out "on the pension roll, subject to its provisions and limitations."

The amendments recommended by the committee were considered, and agreed to.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with a favorable recommendation.

MINNIE B. TITUS.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 8610) granting a pension to Minnie B. Titus.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension roll, at the rate of $10 per month, the name of Minnie B. Titus, daughter of Edward H. Titus, late a private in Company A, Thirteenth New Jersey Infantry Volunteers.

The amendments recommended by the committee were as follows:

Lines 4 and 5, strike out "at the rate of $10 per month" and insert in lieu thereof the words "subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws."

After "Titus," line 5, insert "the permanently helpless and dependent."

After "Volunteers," line 7, add the words "and pay her a pension at the rate of $10 per month."

Mr. HANDY. I would like, Mr. Chairman, to hear the report read.

The report (by Mr. WARNER) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 8610) granting a pension to Minnie B. Titus, has examined the same and all the evidence relating thereto and respectfully reports:

This bill proposes to pension at $10 per month Minnie B. Titus, of Edgewood, Pa., the dependent daughter of Edward H. Titus, late a private in Company A, Thirteenth New Jersey Infantry, and Company F, Thirteenth Veteran Reserve Corps, who served from July 24, 1862, to June 28, 1865, when honorably discharged. There is record of his treatment while in service for nephritis and bronchitis or pleurisy.

Soldier filed a claim July 13, 1888, under the general law, based on disease of heart and rheumatism. It was submitted for admission by an examiner, approved for admission of disease of heart by reviewer, and for rejection of rheumatism, subject to the action of the medical referee, on the ground of no disability since filing. After that action was placed on the brief, claim was returned to the examiner to verify the service of a comrade and to ask that comrade to give a full account of soldier's condition in the service. That claim has never been adjudicated.

He filed and established a claim under the act of June 27, 1890, and was pensioned for disease of heart at $10 per month from December 8, 1890, to October 23, 1894, when he died.

The widow filed a claim as such under the act of June 27, 1890, but died before completing it.

May 25, 1898, a claim was filed on account of two minor children of the soldier, and that claim is still pending. Evidence filed with this committee shows that the beneficiary of this bill was 16 years of age at the time of her father's death, and consequently has no pensionable rights as the law is construed by the Pension Bureau. It shows, however, that she is deaf and dumb, and her sight is so seriously impaired that she is unable to do anything for her own support, and has been in that condition since she was 3 years of age. Neither her father nor her mother left any property, and she is dependent on charity.

The minors claimed for are undoubtedly entitled to pension from the date their claim was filed, and will be until they reach the age of 16 years; but such fact has no particular bearing here.

This child is entitled to a pension as the helpless and dependent daughter of the soldier. She is within the spirit of the law, as this committee and the House and Senate have frequently held.

The bill is therefore reported back with the recommendation that it pass when amended as follows:

Lines 4 and 5, strike out "at the rate of $10 per month" and insert in lieu thereof the words "subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws."

After "Titus," line 5, insert "the permanently helpless and dependent."

After "Volunteers," line 7, add the words "and pay her a pension at the rate of $10 per month."

The amendments recommended by the committee were agreed to.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with a favorable recommendation.

SARAH A. LUKE.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 5712) granting a pension to Sarah A. Luke.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to enter upon the pension roll the name of Sarah A. Luke, widow of Capt. John W. Luke, late of Company E, Fifteenth Regiment Illinois Infantry Volunteers, at the rate of $20 per month, this to be in lieu of any other pension that she may now be drawing on her own account.

The committee amendments were as follows:

In line 7, after "Volunteers," insert "and pay her a pension."

Strike out all after "month," in line 7, and insert "in lieu of the pension she is now receiving."

Mr. HANDY. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the chairman of the Committee on Invalid Pensions what pension this lady is now receiving and what is the reason for the increase?

Mr. RAY of New York. She is now receiving $8 a month. The soldier was mustered into the service, and served long and faithfully. He was wounded in both thighs, promoted and made first lieutenant, and after that made captain; and he took part in a dozen battles, and was in the campaign from Atlanta to the sea and then up the coast. He was seriously wounded in other engagements, but always returned to his duty.

He died in 1875; but it could not be proved that his death was caused by these disabilities received in the service, although the committee believed that such was the fact; but we do not say it, and we do not undertake to overrule the Pension Bureau in that regard. Under the law she could get only $8 a month. She is very poor.

Mr. HANDY. Is $8 a month the maximum a widow can receive when she can not prove that her husband died from disabilities received in the service?

Mr. RAY of New York. It is. There is no law that will give a widow of a private or an officer more than $8 a month, unless it can be shown that the death of the soldier was the result of disease or disability incurred in the service.

Mr. HANDY. If the death of the soldier was the result of disease or wounds received in the service, what is the limit?

Mr. RAY of New York. Twelve dollars in the case of a private, and then up to $30, according to the rank the husband held.

Mr. HANDY. What would be the amount this widow could receive if she could prove that her husband died of disabilities received in the service?

Mr. RAY of New York. As captain, $20; and we give her $20 on account of the rank of her husband, and on account of her age and necessity. She is old and poor and has no one on whom she can rely.

Mr. HANDY. It seems to me like a meritorious case, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. GIBSON. Yes, and she has six children.

The amendments recommended by the committee were considered, and agreed to.

Mr. RAY of New York. Mr. Chairman, when I drew the committee amendments there was one I neglected to make. I move to amend, in line 4, by striking out the word "enter" and insert in lieu thereof the word "place;" so it will read "place upon the pension roll."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was laid aside with a favorable recommendation.

JESSE EVERLY.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 11017) to restore Jesse Everly to the pension roll of the United States.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to restore to the pension roll of the United States, at the rate of $12 per month, from May 4, 1898, the name of Jesse Everly, late a member of Company A, Twenty-sixth Regiment of Kentucky Volunteer Infantry, in the United States Army in the war of the rebellion, and to issue to him a certificate for said pension in lieu of the one revoked.

The committee amendments were as follows:

Mr. RAY of New York. Mr. Chairman, all I need to say in regard to this bill is that it is recommended by the Commissioner of Pensions. There was a little technicality, so that they could not give it, and he recommended special legislation.

Mr. MAGUIRE. On what ground was the pension revoked?

Mr. RAY of New York. Upon a technical ground.

Mr. HANDY. I understood the gentleman from New York to state that on some technical ground the commissioner declined to grant this pension.

Mr. RAY of New York. On a technical ground the commissioner refused to restore the pensioner to the pension roll. At one time he was on the roll. The report states—

In 1875 he filed a claim for pension under the general law, and was pensioned at $4 per month from date of filing. Later, under the arrears act, he was pensioned from date of discharge (by the adjutant-general of Kentucky) to the date of the original commencement of his pension. His rate was increased to $8 from July 22, 1885, on application and examination. In May, 1891, he was pensioned at $12 per month from July 16, 1890, under the act of June 27, 1890, for gunshot wound of left foot, disease of stomach, and resulting emaciation and debility. It was recently discovered that an error had been committed in pensioning claimant under the general law, he having no title because of never having been mustered into the United States service, and in consequence of that discovery his name was dropped from the pension roll.

At the same time that the action of dropping was recommended by the chief of the board of review he recommended that the case be referred to Congress for legislation looking to the soldier's relief, in view of the fact that his wound was received in action, and, in a letter dated June 9, 1898, the Commissioner of Pensions said:

"It may be proper to state that while under existing laws Mr. Everly does not appear to have title to pension, the fact that he was wounded in action while serving with Company A, Twenty-sixth Kentucky Volunteers, and that he was discharged by the adjutant-general of Kentucky on account of wound, is shown by the evidence on file, and the case appears to be one that is worthy of special legislation by Congress looking to his relief."

This man actually served in battle and received this gunshot wound which disabled him, and on account of this wound he was pensioned. Subsequently it was found that he had not been regularly mustered in, and on account of that technicality his name was dropped. The Department now recommends that we give him a pension.

Mr. HANDY. How did it happen that he was not regularly mustered in? Did he have a regiment and company, and how long did he serve?

Mr. GIBSON. Under a law passed about 1875 a citizen wounded in battle was entitled to be pensioned, provided he had filed his claim before July 4, 1874. This man filed his claim after that date, and on a review of the case this fact was discovered. For that reason he was dropped from the rolls.

Mr. HANDY. You are familiar with this particular case?

Mr. GIBSON. I am familiar with the law on the subject, and am somewhat familiar with the case for the reason that I am on the committee.

Mr. HANDY. Did this man, when he first made his application, allege that he had been mustered in and belonged to a particular company and regiment?

Mr. GIBSON. No, sir; only that he was wounded in battle. Our pension laws provide that any citizen wounded in battle shall be entitled to a pension provided he filed his claim before July 4, 1874.

Mr. RAY of New York. The soldier is not required to state or prove in his application that he was mustered in; he is only required to state that he served, and to name the company and regiment in which he served. There is no doubt that he actually served about a year in the company and regiment named by him. The defect in his case was in the fact that he did not happen to be mustered in. Suppose the gentleman from Delaware during the war had gone into a company and regiment and for some reason the officers had neglected to muster him in.

Suppose he did not know anything about the requirement of the law in that respect. Suppose he served with the company and regiment for a year or two, and was then wounded in battle. Suppose, then, he came home, and after a lapse of years, when he had become old and poor, applied for a pension. Suppose the Pension Department discovered that he had not been actually mustered in, and suppose that on that account he was refused a pension. Would not the gentleman consider himself justly entitled to a pension?

Mr. HANDY. Under such circumstances, no doubt I should; but I was thinking that possibly this man might be one of those fellows called "camp-followers," who had got into battle by mistake.

Mr. RAY of New York. Oh, no. This man actually served in this regiment; he did duty faithfully with the regiment, and finally, while with the regiment in battle, was shot.

Mr. HANDY. How long did his service last?

Mr. GIBSON. From October 22, 1861, until August 22, 1862. He would have been mustered in but for the wound which he received in battle. That made him unfit for service, and the surgeon refused to give him a certificate of physical qualification.

Mr. HANDY. What regiment and company was he with during the time that he served?

Mr. GIBSON. Company A, Twenty-sixth Kentucky Volunteers. He was wounded at the battle of Whip-poor-will Creek, Kentucky, December 1, 1861.

Mr. HANDY. At what rate is it proposed to pension him?

Mr. GIBSON. Twelve dollars a month.

Mr. HANDY. Is that the rate at which he was pensioned before he was dropped?

Mr. GIBSON. Yes, sir.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was laid aside to be reported favorably.

THE ELECTION OF SENATORS BY THE PEOPLE.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. President, I present a resolution which has just been adopted by the general assembly of North Carolina, in regard to the election of United States Senators by a vote of the people; which I ask may be read.

There being no objection, the resolution was read, as follows:

Resolution in regard to the election of United States Senators by a vote of the people.

Resolved by the general assembly of North Carolina, First. That it is in favor of the election of United States Senators of the several States by a vote of the people of the several States.

Second. That it most respectfully requests our Senators and Representatives in Congress to do all in their power to have submitted to the legislatures of the different States an amendment to the Federal Constitution looking to this end.

Third. That the clerk of the senate is hereby directed to furnish to each of our members in Congress a copy of this resolution.

A true copy.

H. G. CONNOR,
Speaker of the House.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. President, I desire to call the attention of the Committee on Privileges and Elections to the resolution which has just been read. The chairman of that committee is not, I regret, in his seat at present. There are now a number of joint resolutions before that committee providing for such an amendment to the Federal Constitution to be proposed to the legislatures of the several States. On January 5, 1898, I introduced a joint resolution (S. R. 78) "proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States providing for the election of Senators by the votes of the qualified electors of the States," which proposed amendment was referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections. It is still before that committee. There is besides a House joint resolution (H. Res. 5) to the same effect before that committee. The House resolution passed that body on May 11, 1898, and came to this body on May 12, and was referred to the Senate committee.

But so far the Committee on Privileges and Elections has not taken action on any of these resolutions. This is not the first time that the House has passed similar resolutions proposing such an amendment to the Constitution as the general assembly of North Carolina declares in favor of, and on at least one occasion the action of the House has been unanimous. I trust, Mr. President, that the Committee on Privileges and Elections will take up this resolution, which has passed the House, and give us an early report on it. If we can have a report at this session, and the Senate will pass the House resolution, then the amendment can at once go to the legislatures of every State and give them a chance to act on it. Mr. President, Congress can propose any amendment to the Constitution to the legislatures of the several States whenever it so desires, but I submit that when a number of States ask for a particular amendment to be submitted we should give some consideration to their requests.

North Carolina is not alone in this position, for already a majority of the States of the Union have, I think, passed similar resolutions through their general assemblies. I have in my hand a list of 24 States that have, I am informed, passed similar resolutions, and only the other day the governor of Pennsylvania, in his annual message to the general assembly of that State, strongly recommended the adoption of such an amendment.

Mr. GALLINGER. Will the Senator kindly have the list of those States printed in the RECORD?

Mr. BUTLER. Certainly. The following are the States, if I am correctly informed:

California,	Michigan,	Missouri,	Wyoming,
Colorado,	Oregon,	Montana,	Iowa,
Florida,	Wisconsin,	Nebraska,	Kansas,
Idaho,	Kentucky,	Nevada,	New York,
Illinois,	Louisiana,	Ohio,	South Carolina,
Indiana,	West Virginia,	Utah,	North Carolina.

Mr. HOAR. If this matter is going to be debated at this hour, I should like to take a hand. I hope the Senator is not going to precipitate any discussion when we have even cut off the reading of the Journal.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. President, I do not care to discuss the merits of the proposed amendment at this time. I shall be glad to hear the Senator from Massachusetts discuss it if we can get the committee to make a report, so that the question may properly be before the Senate for discussion, and that is what I am now trying to do. I am calling the attention of the committee to the number of State legislatures that have passed resolutions asking Congress to submit such an amendment, and appealing to that committee to make a report on the House resolution, so that the Senate can take action. The fact that a majority of the States have taken the initiative in petitioning Congress to submit such an amendment, indicates a very strong popular demand for such a change. I think it safe to say that it indicates that more than three-fourths of the State legislatures would ratify such an amendment when formally submitted to them.

Mr. President, there is another fact that should appeal to the committee and to the Senate, and that is the object lessons that we have to-day in so many State legislatures that are trying to elect Senators. There are eight States to-day—Delaware, Pennsylvania, California, Utah, Wisconsin, Nebraska, Washington, and Montana—that are in a deadlock over the election of Senators, with the possibility, if not probability, of continuous deadlocks that will result in leaving a number of vacant seats in this Senate. In one State, where a deadlock has just been broken, there is notice of a contest to be brought into this body.

That is not the worst; scandals are cropping out, charges of bribery are being made, and in some cases proven, to say nothing of the demoralization of the State legislatures where these things are occurring. These great and growing evils seem clearly to outweigh whatever supposed advantage there may have been in the indirect method of electing Senators.

Mr. President, even if these Senatorial scandals and legislative deadlocks did not occur—which do occur and which are growing more frequent and odious each year—yet the fact that so many States have, through their legislatures, asked Congress to submit such an amendment should appeal to the Committee on Privileges and Elections to report back the House joint resolution so that the merits of the question can be discussed on the floor of the Senate.

Indeed, Mr. President, I think it goes further and appeals to the Senate to pass the joint resolution and give the legislatures of the several States an opportunity to say whether or not they wish to change the present method of electing their Senators. It now seems that such an amendment is absolutely necessary to revive and preserve the spirit of the Constitution.

Mr. President, I will not detain the Senate further on this question now. I ask that the memorial from the North Carolina legislature be referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections. I trust they will give us an early report, when I shall ask to be heard on the merits of the question.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, I must call for the regular order.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Maine calls for the regular order, which is the presentation of petitions and memorials. The memorial presented by the Senator from North Carolina will be referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections. If there are no further petitions and memorials, reports of committees are next in order.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. GALLINGER, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 8816) for the relief of the heirs of Minnie Frederich, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. PRITCHARD. I am directed by the Committee on Civil Service and Retrenchment, to whom was referred the resolution submitted by the Senator from Illinois [Mr. MASON] on the 26th instant, to report it without amendment, and I ask unanimous consent for its present consideration.

The Senate, by unanimous consent, proceeded to consider the resolution; which was read, as follows:

Whereas an investigation of the administration of the Bureau of Engraving and Printing by the present director of said Bureau was ordered by the present Secretary of the Treasury through a committee composed of Messrs. Lyman, Hendricks, and Brown; and

Whereas said investigating committee have made a report to the Secretary of the Treasury of the result of their investigation:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, requested to submit said report, together with the testimony taken in said investigation, to the Senate.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. We do not use the word "requested" when we call upon the heads of Departments, but the word "directed."

Mr. MILLS. It should read "directed."

Mr. PRITCHARD. Let the resolution be so amended.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The resolution will be so amended. The question is on agreeing to the resolution as amended.

The resolution as amended was agreed to.

DAKOTA SOUTHERN RAILWAY.

Mr. PETTIGREW. I am directed by the Committee on Indian Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. 5282) granting to the Dakota Southern Railway Company a right of way through the Yankton Indian lands in the State of South Dakota, to report it without amendment, and I ask for its immediate consideration. It is a very brief right-of-way bill.

Mr. HALE. I will not object if it does not give rise to debate.

Mr. PETTIGREW. I think it can not give rise to debate.

Mr. HALE. I withhold my objection.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

A bill (S. 5383) granting an increase of pension to Hannah Markley; and

A bill (S. 5384) granting an increase of pension to Andrew Davis.

Mr. CAFFERY introduced a bill (S. 5385) for the relief of the New Orleans and Bayou Sara Mail Company; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. GALLINGER introduced a bill (S. 5386) restoring to the pension roll the name of Samuel S. McDonald; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. BUTLER (by request) introduced a bill (S. 5387) to regulate the service and fix the hours of service for persons employed as policemen and officers in the District of Columbia; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas introduced a bill (S. 5388) granting the right of way through Indian reservations to the Choctaw, Oklahoma and Gulf Railroad Company; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. PETTIGREW introduced a bill (S. 5389) to provide for the acquiring of rights of way by railroad companies through Indian reservations, Indian lands, and Indian allotments, and for other purposes; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. FORAKER introduced a bill (S. 5390) granting an increase of pension to Martha G. D. Lyster; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. SULLIVAN introduced a bill (S. 5392) to limit the class of persons who shall receive pensions; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

AMENDMENTS TO APPROPRIATION BILLS.

Mr. PRITCHARD (for Mr. ELKINS) submitted an amendment relative to an increase in the salaries of the Second and Third Assistant Secretaries, Department of State, intended to be proposed by him to the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

He also (for Mr. ELKINS) submitted an amendment relative to an increase in the salary of the consul at Windsor, Nova Scotia, intended to be proposed by him to the diplomatic and consular appropriation bill; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. PASCO submitted an amendment authorizing the Secretary of War to enter into contract or contracts for such materials and work as may be necessary for the completion of the improvement of the St. Johns River, Florida, intended to be proposed by him to the river and harbor appropriation bill; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. DANIEL submitted an amendment proposing to appropriate $2,957.81 to pay the governor of the State of Virginia for clothing and shoes furnished to the United States for the use of the Second, Third, and Fourth Regiments of Virginia Volunteers, etc., intended to be proposed by him to the Army appropriation bill; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

RIGHTS OF WOMEN IN THE TERRITORY OF HAWAII.

Mr. WARREN submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (S. 4895) to provide a government for the Territory of Hawaii; which was referred to the Committee on Woman Suffrage.

JOHN CONNER, SR.

Mr. TURLEY submitted an amendment proposing to appropriate the sum of $1,804.60 to pay John Conner, sr., of Lauderdale County, Tenn., as compensation for 20.1 acres of cleared land, at $25 per acre, etc., intended to be proposed by him to the sundry civil appropriation bill; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

On motion of Mr. TURLEY, it was Ordered, That the Committee on Claims be discharged from the further consideration of the papers of John Conner, sr., and that they be referred to the Committee on Commerce, to accompany the amendment to compensate him.

BRAZOS RIVER IMPROVEMENT.

Mr. MILLS submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved by the Senate, That the Secretary of War be directed to submit a report of survey and estimates for the improvement of the mouth of the Brazos River, near Velasco, Tex., with such information as may be in his possession for the improvement thereof by continuing the work done by the Brazos River Channel and Dock Company, or otherwise, with probable cost, and such other information as he may have in connection with the proposed improvement.

FOREIGN PENSION LAWS.

Mr. GALLINGER submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of State be, and he is hereby, directed to procure from the representatives of the Government abroad, for transmission to the Senate, a synopsis of the pension laws (not civil) of the leading nations of the world, with statement showing the aggregate amount of annual appropriation made by each country for the above purpose.

ADDITIONAL CLERK FOR COMMITTEE ON TERRITORIES.

Mr. HANSBROUGH submitted the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate:

Resolved, That the Committee on Territories be, and it hereby is, authorized to employ an additional clerk for the remainder of the present session of Congress, at the rate of $1,440 per annum, same to be paid out of the contingent fund of the Senate.

THE MERCHANT MARINE.

On motion of Mr. FRYE, it was Ordered, That there be printed for the use of the Senate, in addition to the usual number, 600 copies of the bill (S. 5024) to promote the commerce and increase the foreign trade of the United States and to provide auxiliary cruisers, transports, and seamen for Government use when necessary.

CLOTHING ACCOUNTS OF DECEASED SOLDIERS.

Mr. HAWLEY. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 10912) for adjusting clothing account for deceased soldiers in certain cases. The Auditor for the War Department desires very much that this act shall be passed, because he is being embarrassed constantly and is being obliged to commit what is an act of injustice toward the soldier or toward his heirs. There can be no possible debate on the bill. It is a mere matter of accounting, and, as I said, the Auditor has to do what he thinks is an injustice every day.

Mr. HALE. It is very desirable that the diplomatic and consular appropriation bill shall be passed before 2 o'clock, because then it would be cut off. I give notice that after this bill is disposed of I shall ask the Senate to take up the appropriation bill. I shall not object to this bill if it does not give rise to debate.

Mr. HAWLEY. There can not be any debate upon it.

Mr. BACON. I wish to call the attention of the Senator from Maine to the fact that several days since I gave notice that at the conclusion of the morning business to-day I would ask the Senate to take up Senate joint resolution No. 211, which I have introduced, relative to the policy of the Government in the Philippine Islands. I hope the Senator will not interpose the motion which he now gives notice he will make. I do not suppose it will take any great length of time. It certainly will not unless it is taken by some one other than myself.

Mr. HALE. If the Senator desires to submit remarks, of course under the rule of courtesy in the body I can not object, but certainly I can not give way to the taking up of any other subject for action. I do not think it is customary to gain any additional right for the passage of resolutions or bills by giving notice. If we shall adopt that extension of the courtesy of the Senate, Senators will see at once that preference would be given to a particular measure or resolution by a Senator simply giving notice that he will call it up. If the Senator desires to address the Senate on the subject, of course under the usual rule, as I have said, I can not object; but I think he will see, as all will see, that we must get the appropriation bills out of the way. Otherwise we shall not finish the business of the session.

Mr. HAWLEY. I renew my request.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Unanimous consent is asked by the Senator from Connecticut for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 10912) for adjusting clothing account for deceased soldiers in certain cases.

Mr. HOAR. How long a bill is it?

Mr. HAWLEY. It is about ten seconds long.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It provides that in the adjustment of the accounts of volunteers enrolled on account of the existing war with Spain, who have died, or may hereafter die within six months from the date of their enrollment, the accounting officers of the Treasury shall make no stoppage on account of clothing overdrawn against the pay or allowances otherwise found due the widow, heirs, or legal representative of the soldier, unless the amount of clothing actually drawn by him is in excess of the clothing allowance for a soldier of his grade for the first six months of service.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

DIPLOMATIC AND CONSULAR APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. HALE. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of House bill 11487, the diplomatic and consular appropriation bill.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, I do not desire to antagonize the motion of the Senator from Maine, but I respectfully submit that I have at least a right to make the motion of which I gave notice. I gave notice several days ago that to-day I would move to proceed to the consideration of Senate joint resolution No. 211. I will state to the Senator that I have no disposition to intrude upon the time that he desires, and that I simply desire that the Senate shall act upon the motion to take up the joint resolution. I will be perfectly willing then that it shall be laid aside.

Mr. HALE. Let the Senator then ask for unanimous consent. I do not object to taking it up. Then my motion can be put.

Mr. BACON. Of course I should be very glad to have unanimous consent, but I do not desire to leave the matter there. I desire to have the sense of the Senate on the question of taking up the joint resolution.

Mr. CHANDLER. Does the Senator desire to have a vote taken on the disposition of the joint resolution to-day?

Mr. BACON. I do not if Senators desire that it shall not be voted on to-day.

The Senator from Montana [Mr. CARTER] yesterday in speaking to the proposition for unanimous consent in reference to several of these resolutions said that they had been introduced by Senators for the purpose of furnishing texts upon which speeches could be delivered. I am not prepared to state as to the resolutions introduced by other Senators, but that certainly is not true of the joint resolution introduced by myself. It was introduced for a practical purpose, which if subserved must be done within a few days, because that purpose will affect the position which Senators will take with reference to a very grave matter that is ahead of us, the question of the ratification of the treaty. It being a joint resolution if it is to effect any purpose it must have the time not only for passage through the Senate, but through the House. It was introduced by me not for the purpose of making a speech, but for the practical purpose of endeavoring to bring us to a basis where we can have a solution of this matter, and where there may be an agreement among those who now to a certain extent disagree.

Mr. President, if I may be pardoned for making a further statement, the joint resolution is intensely practical, in the view, in my opinion, that if it should become a law as the expression of this Government it would entirely dissipate the danger that we are in of war. For that reason I desire not to ask, as was asked yesterday, unanimous consent that we take a vote, but that the Senate take up the joint resolution. It is a most grave matter; and it strikes me that this grave body should be willing to meet the issue and to declare to the world what is our position relative to this most important subject without side-tracking or anything else.

Mr. HALE. I suppose I am in entire sympathy with the Senator upon his resolution, but I do think, with all the time which is being consumed by Senators who give notice of speeches which nobody can shut off, that occasionally an hour should be given to the appropriation bills. We are far behind the House.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. It will not take an hour.

Mr. HALE. I do not suppose the bill, if it comes up, will take twenty minutes. It never takes long to pass a diplomatic and consular appropriation bill, and this bill ought to be passed and go into conference.

Mr. BACON. With that statement of the Senator, if I may be allowed to do so, I will change the notice I have given to the effect that I shall make the motion after the passage of the appropriation bill, if it is to occupy so short a time.

Mr. HALE. I am personally very much obliged to the Senator from Georgia, because I want to get the bill through this morning.

Mr. BACON. I do not want to antagonize the appropriation bill.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Maine asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 11487) making appropriations for the diplomatic and consular service of the United States for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1900. Is there objection?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which had been reported from the Committee on Appropriations with amendments.

Mr. HALE. I ask that the formal reading of the bill be dispensed with, and that the amendments of the committee be considered as they are reached in the reading.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there any objection. The Chair hears none, and the order is made as suggested.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. I ask the Senator from Maine to yield to me for a moment.

Mr. HALE. Certainly.

FUNERAL OF EX-SENATOR A. H. GARLAND.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. Mr. President, the Senate is aware that ex-Senator Garland, who was for a number of years an honored member of this body, and who was the Attorney-General of the United States, died within a day or two. His funeral takes place to-day at 2 o'clock. His body will be borne from the city to his home for burial at half past 3. There are a number of Senators who desire to attend the funeral ceremonies; and I ask the unanimous consent of the Senate that there be a recess taken from 2 until half past 3 to enable Senators who desire to do so to attend the funeral.

Mr. CHANDLER. I suggest that the Senator ask that we shall adjourn.

Mr. FRYE and others. Oh, no.

Mr. CHANDLER. It is Saturday afternoon.

Mr. TELLER and others. No, no.

Mr. HALE. Let us come back.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. I am unwilling to ask that the Senate shall adjourn, in view of the unanimous-consent agreement which has obtained in the Senate heretofore, but I ask for a recess.

Mr. HOAR. Mr. President, as the Senator from Arkansas has made this request, perhaps it will not be inappropriate for some gentleman on this side of the Chamber to express the great affection which his old associates here felt for this eminent gentleman who died so suddenly in the height of his intellectual vigor in the Capitol itself.

He was a model of the Senatorial character, an admirable lawyer, a statesman whose vision and interest comprehended the whole country without distinction of section or party, a man full of patriotism, of unimpeachable personal integrity, a model not only of the character of the Senator, but of the character of the gentleman.

I am very glad that this slight token of our respect, which is all we can under the circumstances pay Mr. Garland, is likely to be paid.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Unanimous consent is asked that a recess be taken from 2 o'clock until 3.30 this afternoon for the purpose stated by the Senator from Arkansas.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. To attend the funeral services of ex-Senator Garland at the Colonial Hotel.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none. The order is made.

DIPLOMATIC AND CONSULAR APPROPRIATION BILL.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 11487) making appropriations for the diplomatic and consular service of the United States for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1900.

The Secretary proceeded to read the bill, and continued the reading to line 4, on page 5.

Mr. HALE. After line 4 I move to insert:

For the salaries of three third secretaries of embassy at London, at Paris, and at Berlin, at the rate of $1,600 each per annum, $4,800.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HALE. On page 5, line 5, I move to change the total of the appropriations for "salaries of secretaries of embassies and legations" from $58,900 to $63,700.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed. The first amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, under the subhead "Ground rent of legation at Tokyo, Japan," on page 6, line 23, after the word "fifteenth," to strike out "1899" and insert "1900;" so as to make the clause read:

Annual ground rent of the legation at Tokyo, Japan, for the year ending March 15, 1900, $250, or so much thereof as may be necessary.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 11, after line 18, to insert:

INTERNATIONAL CONFERENCE ON A CATALOGUE OF SCIENTIFIC LITERATURE.

For the purpose of carrying out on the part of the United States the recommendation of the International Conference on a Catalogue of Scientific Literature, held in London in July, 1896, for the expense of clerk hire and the other expenses incident to the work of cataloguing the scientific publications of the United States, the same to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of the Smithsonian Institution, $5,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was continued to line 7, on page 13.

Mr. HALE. On page 13, line 7, after the word "thousand," I move to insert "five hundred;" so as to read:

For salaries of consuls, vice-consuls, and commercial agents, $426,500.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HALE. On page 18, line 15, after the word "Martinique," I move to insert "Nantes;" so as to include Nantes in consulates of Class VI, where the salary is fixed at $1,500.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed and continued to Schedule C, Class VII, on page 20, line 13.

Mr. HALE. On account of the insertion of the amendment which has just been adopted, I move to strike out lines 13 and 18 on page 20.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 20, after line 11, it is proposed to strike out:

France and French dominions:
Consul at Nantes.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed and concluded.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, before the bill is passed, I simply want to call attention to three consulates of which I have some knowledge, and while I regret to say that my former appeals to increase the salaries of consuls of the United States at foreign ports where they are living on starvation wages have been fruitless, I feel constrained to call attention to the matter once more.

We will take Pernambuco, Brazil, as an illustration, where there happens to be a New Hampshire man in the consular service. The estimates which were made for the consular service by the State Department recommended a salary of $2,500 at Pernambuco, but Congress apparently knows more about that matter than does the Department, and they report this bill giving the consul $2,000.

I will not take time, Mr. President, to read the letter which I hold in my hand from the consul at that place, a son of a distinguished United States Senator, who at one time was President pro tempore of this body; but if there be no objection, I should like to insert it in the RECORD, in the hope that some of the economists of Congress may take occasion to read what this man writes concerning the cost of living in Pernambuco, the paucity of the salary, and the meanness of the Government in treating its representatives abroad as this Government does in almost every instance. The consul did not use the word "meanness," Mr. President, but I use it here, as I have used it on more than one occasion before. I ask permission to have this letter inserted in the RECORD, and to suggest that I shall endeavor to have an amendment adopted increasing this salary to the point recommended by the Department.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and that order will be made.

The letter referred to is as follows:

CONSULATE OF THE UNITED STATES,
Pernambuco, November 5, 1898.

MY DEAR SIR: As you have kindly offered to read my views on the consular service in this part of the world, I herewith jot them down. In his letter, transmitting estimates of the consular appropriation for the fiscal year 1898–1899, the Secretary of State writes as follows:

"Bahia, Para, and Pernambuco, Brazil, an increase from $2,000 to $2,500 in the salaries of each of these places is recommended. Our interests in all of these places are extensive, and the opportunities for further extension of trade are great. The climate is unhealthy and the compensation should be sufficient to offset this drawback, in part at least. We need men of ability and experience in all of these new fields of commerce."

This recommendation was made after the aforesaid consulates had been looked over by a special examiner, who reported what he found—needs, etc. Why make two bites at a cherry—why not make the salary $3,000? 'Tis no more than should be paid. No competent man should be asked to come into these tropical climates to contend with the difficulties of the language, to put up with the thousand and one inconveniences, to ostracize himself from what we know of civilization, and to expose himself to the insidious diseases of the country without sufficient remuneration. By that I mean not a bare living, but the salary should be such that he may be able to put by something for a rainy day. The expenses of living here are large, and the low rate of exchange alone makes it possible to keep up appearances, for I think it will be conceded that they count for something. A consul can not make his influence felt living in lodgings and on a cracker-and-cheese diet. He is the accredited official of a great country, and varied and numerous are the calls made upon him; much is expected of him, and he can not stand forth in the proper light on a meager salary.

"The time is rapidly approaching when it will be the reverse of judicious to allow any man unacquainted with world politics to round off his career in a first-class foreign mission.

"We shall have to look at diplomacy as the highest and best paid of trades. Public servants of this sort can not be kept on board wages."

It is notorious that the American consular service is the worst paid and the poorest equipped of any of the great countries. It will be contended that many are offering to fill the places on the present salaries; true, but how?

Is not a man's experience worth something? Why, as I look back to the time I came here practically green, I feel that I have already become much more useful to my country in this capacity than two or three green men could possibly be. One little knows the many important details of an office of this kind, and can only learn from actual experience. This district has a coast line of between eight and nine hundred miles and an area greater than our New England, and all of it is under the jurisdiction of the consul at Pernambuco. Then the danger from disease is great in this country; yellow fever and smallpox is always prevalent—a man is here to-day and buried to-morrow. To one unaccustomed to it deaths and funerals come with great harshness; it almost seems as though the breath had time to leave the body before the corpse is hurried into the grave; but all these things are imperative in the Tropics.

The British consul receives as salary £100 per month and an allowance of £400 for office rent, incidentals, etc., beside 2½ per cent commission on all disbursements; for all this he draws draft at sight.

The American consul is the disbursing agent for the United States in this, viz, care and transportation of shipwrecked mariners, American seamen in distress, etc.; in fact all contingent expenses must be paid from his pocket, and he can draw to reimburse himself at the end of each quarter, thus forcing him in many instances to advance money in behalf of the United States.

The Italian consul here receives 35,000 francs salary, and the consul from little Chile, with nothing to do, $2,000 salary, beside 2½ per cent commission on all disbursements; he draws draft for all this in advance. It is admitted on all sides that the American consular service does more to advance trade for its country than any other similar service in the world. Is not the laborer worthy of his hire?

The following is taken from the report of the Auditor for the State and other Departments for the year ending June 30, 1896:

Comparative statement of consular fees received and expenditures made annually from 1884 to 1896, inclusive.

Year.	Consular fees received.	Salaries and other expenses.	Excess of expenditures.	Excess of receipts.
1884	$805,780.27	$872,345.08		$23,435.19
1885	791,345.43	870,183.10	$78,837.67
1886	881,569.79	900,604.90	19,035.11
1887	950,690.64	918,973.26		31,717.38
1888	999,172.31	934,983.93		64,188.38
1889	979,191.60	953,580.37		15,611.23
1890	1,039,653.26	1,032,048.08		7,605.18
1891	978,142.58	1,095,160.93	117,018.35
1892	940,040.50	1,097,585.55	157,545.05
1893	1,009,060.26	1,105,103.16	96,042.90
1894	758,410.81	1,055,417.43	297,006.62
1895	938,764.66	1,039,332.58	100,567.92
1896	975,500.30	1,045,920.70	70,420.40

To sum up briefly, the consular service cost the United States during those thirteen years just $53,542.59 per annum, truly a munificent sum. The national legislator who, in view of these facts, would not vote to increase the consuls' salaries ought not to draw his breath, much less draw his salary.

While I enjoy my work and do not find it irksome, the idea that obtains in some quarters "that a consul has nothing to do" is erroneous. If he be conscientious and desirous of rendering the best service possible, he must keep his eyes and ears open and his office hours will be none too long for its proper accomplishment.

Happily the war is ended and everything so far seems to have redounded to the glory of the American arms. 'Twill be a glorious outcome if the conclusion is carried forward as speedily and successfully. We are very pleasantly situated here and have so far enjoyed the best of health, yet I should rejoice if the powers that be would transfer me a little nearer civilization and God's country. I wish you might use your influence to have something done at the next session, with both ends in view.

With the compliments of the season from Mrs. Clark and myself, I remain,

Very truly, yours,

BENJ. F. CLARK.

Hon. J. H. GALLINGER, Concord, N. H.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I chance to have a friend at La Guaira, Venezuela, who is getting the enormous salary of $1,500 a year, with fees of about $500 a year, or an aggregate of $2,000. He is living in one of the most unhealthy ports in Venezuela. He writes me that he is paying $50 a month rent for a house that is not as good as the house he rented in Dover, N. H., for $18 a month; that he is paying from $13 to $14 a barrel for flour; for potatoes of inferior quality, 7 cents a pound; for kerosene oil, 30 cents a gallon, and sugar, 14 cents a pound for the common brown grade. That man is expatriated. It is true he wanted service with the Government. He is an educated man. He was born in France, is an accomplished French and German scholar, and he had desired to serve the Government. He asked for an appointment in either France or Germany, and this accomplished French, German, and English scholar was sent to a country where the language used is Spanish.

I think the consular service ought to be improved by sending men to countries the language of which they speak, and I commend the matter to my civil service friends. This gentleman did want to go abroad; he wanted to serve the Government in the capacity of consul, and was sent to La Guaira, Venezuela, where he is paid $2,000 a year salary; and he pays, as I have said, $50 a month for house rent, $14 a barrel for flour, and everything else in proportion.

I ask consent to have the letter inserted in the RECORD.

Mr. BUTLER. Will the Senator allow me to ask him whether this gentleman pays $14 a barrel for flour in American money or in the money of Venezuela? There is quite a difference between the value of our money and Venezuelan money. I have not a copy of the report before me to show what is the value of the American dollar in that country.

Mr. GALLINGER. My impression is this gentleman means that he pays $14 in American money, or its equivalent, for flour in Venezuela. He does not say anything to the contrary, and I take that to be the fact.

Mr. BUTLER. When our money is changed into the money of Venezuela, a larger number of dollars is received for it.

Mr. GALLINGER. There is no question about that, but I think this gentleman means that he pays the equivalent of $14 a barrel for flour in American money.

Mr. BUTLER. That is the point about which I desired information.

Mr. GALLINGER. I think there is no doubt on that point. I ask consent to have the letter inserted in the RECORD, and as the State Department recommended an increase in this salary of $500, making it $2,000, I shall also endeavor to have that accomplished by an amendment to the bill.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Without objection, the order to print the letter will be made.

The letter referred to is as follows:

CONSULATE OF THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA,
La Guaira, Venezuela, December 10, 1898.

DEAR SENATOR: According to request, I take the liberty to write to you and again trouble you with my affairs. I have been back here about a month, and the weather at the present is quite a little cooler than when I left here last summer. It averages about 80° every day of this month.

As I told you before, my salary at this office is but $1,500, and the agencies under this office bring in about from $500 to $600 generally per year. The cost of living here is very high. For instance, we pay $50 a month rent, and the house we hire for that money is not as good as one we paid $18 in Dover for. Food products are enormously high, as everything pays high duty entering here. For instance, flour retails for about thirteen or fourteen dollars a barrel, the duty on it being about $5 per barrel. Potatoes of very small, inferior quality retail at 7 cents per pound, kerosene about 30 cents a gallon, and sugar 14 cents for common brown grade. This will give you a faint idea of the cost of living here.

Of course the American consul can not live like a beggar; and if I have to live on my salary, the end of the year shows me in debt instead of having laid up anything.

Of course I said before I would prefer a good consulate in Europe, paying about $2,500, but if the change can not be effected, the salary of this consulate ought to be raised to at least $2,500 to enable one to live decently. The consular department of the State Department last year recommended an increase of $500 in the salary of this office without my asking for it, but this really is not sufficient, and I believe that you might bring influence enough to bear to bring the salary to $2,500. La Guaira is the chief port of this country, as the statistics show that over three-fourths of the total imports into this country come through the port of La Guaira, and although Maracaibo sends more merchandise to the United States, they do not import one-fourth as much as this port, and the salary of the consul at Maracaibo is $2,000.

I give you these particulars so as to have something to go by and I hope you will not think me a bore in troubling you again.

Hoping to hear from you at some near future date,

I remain, yours, very truly,

LOUIS GOLDSCHMIDT.

Hon. J. H. GALLINGER.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I have here an extract from a letter of Dr. William Jarvis, consul at Milan, Italy, an educated and cultured gentleman, received by me a few weeks ago, in which he discusses very intelligently what he thinks are the needs of the consular service in that country, which I ask to have inserted in the RECORD.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Without objection, the paper referred to will be inserted.

The matter referred to is as follows:

I think there is a big chance for improvement in the way the Government conducts the consular service. A consul should have a salary that he can live on respectably, and then he should be required to turn in every dollar he receives to the Government, and he ought at all times to work for the Government as faithfully as he would for himself. But I am afraid that is not always the way. When he can cut down expenses without any detriment to the office, he should do so. It almost seems to me as though the United States Government paid the consuls on the same plan that the hotels, etc., over here pay their servants—that is, mighty little, and expect them to make up the difference by beating someone else, or even, when there is a chance, the Government itself. I know that all the consulates are not self-supporting like this one, but that makes no difference in the principle of the thing.

Mr. GALLINGER. All I care to say further in this connection, Mr. President, is that during my service in the other House, as well as in this body, I have been astounded every time the diplomatic and consular bill has passed to observe the inadequacy of compensation which is paid our consuls abroad; and I have felt formerly, as I feel to-day, that one of the ways to increase American trade in foreign countries is to give our consuls respectable salaries, so that they can have respectable offices at which foreigners as well as Americans may call, and where there shall be some evidence of the fact that they represent a great country.

If we should compare these salaries with those given by Great Britain or France or Germany we would be astounded at the utter parsimony, the inexcusable economy, that we are practicing in this matter of salaries to the men who represent very intelligently, and many of them with large experience, this great Government in foreign countries. The evil is a crying one and ought in some way to be remedied.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, if the Committee on Foreign Relations would take into consideration the recommendations of the Secretary of State and reorganize the consular service upon the basis of more liberal salaries, I have no doubt that the Senate would pass the bill at once, and I have no doubt it would be passed by the other branch and become a law; but the Committee on Appropriations did not deem it wise to select here and there one or two cases or a half dozen cases out of the fifty or sixty that are recommended by the Department. The committee was only dealing with salaries under existing law, and so it did not go into the question of increases. All I wish to do is to enforce what I said in the beginning. The Committee on Foreign Relations ought to take up that subject and report a bill covering all of these cases.

There is one suggestion I wish to make in the way of an amendment to the bill. On page 18, at the end of line 22, the word "Clifton," before the word "Canada," should be stricken out and "Niagara Falls" inserted. It is simply a change of name for convenience.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment submitted by the Senator from Maine.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CULLOM. I have not been in the Senate during the consideration of the bill, and I inquire of the Senator from Maine whether its consideration has been completed by the Senate?

Mr. HALE. The reading of the bill has been completed.

Mr. CULLOM. I have a letter from the Secretary of State, to which I called the attention of the Senator in charge of the bill, but I fear he has not read it; and I should like to have it read, so as to let the Senator hear it, and then I shall wish to inquire of him whether it does not make a special case justifying action in this particular matter.

In addition to that, I want to say that I have had several letters with which I do not intend to trouble the Senate; but it seems to me that this particular case is deserving of special attention. I should, therefore, like to have the letter read, at any rate, to see whether or not the Senator will not allow the matter to be fixed.

Mr. HALE. I presume the case to which the Senator refers is like twenty others where the Secretary of State has recommended an increase of salary and gives special reasons for it, as the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER] has just done. Undoubtedly these men find the salaries small; but they are the same as they were when the places were accepted, and the places do not go vacant.

I say again, the Committee on Appropriations did not think it wise to begin to cull and make fish of one and flesh of another, and, therefore, rejected all of them. Every letter from such officers which might be read would make out a good case in itself. The desire of the incumbent of the office to get more salary is natural enough. The salaries are small; there is no profit in them; and it has always been to me a matter of wonder why so many men have a mania for getting into this service—this underpaid service—and every Administration is met by a dozen applications for every place.

Mr. COCKRELL. Will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. HALE. Yes.

Mr. COCKRELL. Has the Senator ever known of any applicant to object to the salary before he got the office?

Mr. HALE. I have never known that.

Mr. COCKRELL. Do they not always willingly take the office knowing what the salary is?

Mr. HALE. I have not known of any resignations because the salaries were inadequate.

Mr. CULLOM. All I have asked in this case is that the letter to which I referred be read, and I think I have a right to that.

Mr. COCKRELL. Nobody is objecting to the letter being read.

Mr. CULLOM. Let it be read, then.

Mr. COCKRELL. I suppose somebody else wants to talk besides the Senator.

Mr. CULLOM. I have not talked at all except to make a request.

Mr. COCKRELL. The letter will be read; I am not objecting to that, but I only want to discuss this question for a minute.

As the Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE] has said, nearly every one of these officers seeks an increase of his salary. The Senator from Illinois knows that all through they are seeking an increase of their salaries, and the Committee on Appropriations could only be consistent in rejecting the whole of them, and I think they did exactly right.

Mr. CULLOM. We will now hear that letter, if it is agreeable to the Senate.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The letter referred to will be read, in the absence of objection.

The Secretary read as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, January 17, 1899.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of the 11th instant, asking to be furnished, for the information of the Senate Committee on Appropriations, with a brief statement of the business transacted at the United States commercial agency at Collingwood, Ontario.

In reply, I have to say that the agency at Collingwood, Ontario, includes all the ports situate on Georgian Bay, of which Collingwood, Owen Sound, Penetang, Parry Sound, Byng Inlet, French River, and Killarney are the principal. Many American vessels arrive at and depart from these ports during the season of navigation, and while much of the commercial agent's time and attention are taken up in adjusting difficulties between the masters and crews of American vessels, yet he receives no compensation therefor, as it has not been deemed advisable, as you are aware, to enforce the marine regulation so far as the ports on the Great Lakes are concerned.

It is also proper to state that Georgian Bay, which is embraced within the Collingwood Agency, is 100 miles long and 60 miles wide, and is the only portion of the Great Lakes which is entirely within Canadian territory.

As the fees of the office, as well as the value of the merchandise exported from the Collingwood consular district, are fully equal to many of the $2,000 consulates, and as it is one of the most important commercial points in Canada, I respectfully recommend that it be added to the consulates of that grade, and that instead of fees it be provided with a fixed salary at $2,000 per annum.

I have the honor to be, sir, your obedient servant,

JOHN HAY, Secretary of State.

Hon. S. M. CULLOM,
United States Senate.

Mr. CULLOM. I merely desire to say a word in reference to the letter which has been read, and shall then submit the matter to the Senator in charge of the bill.

I have barely met this gentleman. He does not belong to my State. I never saw him until a few days ago, when he stated the case to me, which I thought was strong enough to justify me in asking of the Secretary of State to give me the facts regarding it; and, so far as I know, they are given in the letter which has been read. It seems to me that it makes a case which takes it out of the ordinary claim of a consul for an increase of salary. It seems to me the application ought to be granted, as it will not probably occasion any additional expense.

Mr. FAULKNER. What is the compensation of the officer now?

Mr. CULLOM. He is paid by fees. He has to travel nearly all over Canada in order to do his duty, and most of the amount he receives is paid out on that account. I thought in perfect good faith that it was such a case as would justify the Senator in charge of the bill in allowing this consulate to be made a salaried office, and, as the letter of the Secretary of State says, the consul be given a salary of $2,000.

That is all I desire to say. If the Senator in charge of the bill declines to accede to the amendment, I shall make no further opposition.

Mr. HALE. I am very sorry, but I think I must insist on the rule being followed.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I would not delay the Senate a moment longer—and I will delay it but a moment—had it not been for the observation of the Senator from Missouri [Mr. COCKRELL] that these places are sought by a great many men, and that they never are vacant. That is true, Mr. President; but it is not an argument. I take it that there are men in every State of the American Union who would be willing to serve in this body for one-half of what is being paid to the present membership. Indeed, I think from what I read in the newspapers that there are some men in Montana, California, and perhaps in some other States who are willing to pay a bonus for the privilege of sitting in this body; but that is no argument why Senators should not be paid a decent salary, and it is no argument to say that because ambitious, young, enterprising men seek these consular positions the Government should pay them a salary that is meanly inadequate.

In the two instances to which I called attention, where the Department which is presumed to know something about this matter advised slight increases of salary, certain gentlemen who are drawing $5,000 salaries and some perquisites conclude that these men ought to live on $1,500 or $2,000 a year, and they proceed to coolly ignore the recommendations of the Department of State and bring a bill here saying that the smaller sums are the proper rates of compensation for the service.

Mr. President, that is all I care to say. I simply wanted to go on record, probably for the fourth time, as saying that our consular service is verging on the disgraceful in the matter of salaries to the men who represent us abroad and who are expected to give, and who do give, the best possible service to the Government which they are proud to serve in that capacity.

Mr. MORGAN. I offer an amendment, on page 4, in line 18, after the word "Venezuela," to insert "and;" and after the word "Peru" to insert "at $1,800 each;" so that it will read:

Secretaries of legations to Argentine Republic, Venezuela, and Peru, at $1,800 each.

This amendment would give an additional $300 to each of those secretaries of legations. I offer the amendment by the direction of the Committee on Foreign Relations, having presented it in the Senate, by whom it was referred to the Committee on Appropriations some days ago, and is therefore in order.

I was induced to offer the amendment by a letter from the Secretary of State to me urging that some movement should be made to give relief to these three secretaries, so as to equalize the salaries of the secretaries of legations in the South American States. The secretaries in the other South American States, except the three mentioned in the amendment, receive $1,800 a year for their compensation.

I happen to know some of the secretaries of legations at some of these points, and I desire to state that the Secretary at Buenos Ayres is a man of very decided ability, who has filled the office of chargé d'affaires during the time of the absence of Minister Buchanan in that very important part of the continent of South America, and filled it with great credit.

More than that, he has by his earnest efforts contributed very successfully to the prospect of increasing mail and commercial intercourse between the United States and Argentina. He is a man who has already rendered to this Government service worth five or six thousand dollars, instead of fifteen hundred; a gentleman who is a friend of mine and was my secretary at the Paris arbitration. He wrote to me that he was living there and, after paying his way from the United States to Argentina, he had $750 a year for his salary. In the absence of Mr. Buchanan, of course he was obliged to maintain a little better state than a man could afford to do who has to get his meals around at restaurants and coffeehouses and lodgings at an obscure lodging house, in order to preserve himself in a sufficient condition of personal decency to represent so great a Republic as the United States.

Now, we all are met here by the statement of the Senator from Maine, that if you increase one of these salaries you have to increase all of them, or ought to increase all of them, and that it is the duty of the Committee on Foreign Relations to make these recommendations. The Senator forgets that the Committee on Foreign Relations has never been charged at all with consular business. It requires the action of two separate committees, one in regard to ministers and secretaries of legation and the other in regard to consuls and all that class of offices, to make any movement whatever in the direction of the necessary reformation of the salaries of our different consuls and secretaries of legation. Bills have been reported here from the Committee on Foreign Relations on three or four occasions, which have been studied out with very great care, to reorganize the diplomatic service, and also they took the liberty of trying to reorganize the consular service in this respect and in many other respects. Those bills have had no success in Congress at all, because the men who are filling these minor places out in the outside parts of the earth are not the sons of important or distinguished gentlemen. When you come to those places like the embassies, to which the sons of important and distinguished political gentlemen are sent, we find no difficulty in getting increases of salary.

The House seems to have this matter under its jurisdiction. The House and the Senate get upon the statute book an enactment that a secretary of a legation or a consul is to be placed at a certain legation or embassy at a certain salary, and then they regard that as a fixed statute, which can not be amended at all without a special recommendation of some committee of the Senate when it gets over here. The House, at their own pleasure, introduce these propositions from time to time, and they hold them down and we hold them down, making a uniform practice of giving favoritism to certain of our friends and our important men whose sons or friends have got the places in these different legations and consulates.

The growth of this system, Mr. President, is not only derogatory to the character of the United States, but it is defamatory to the men concerned in it. We have one standing committee—one great Committee on Appropriations. They take all the liberties they please with these bills. Whenever they find occasion to raise the salary of a consul or a secretary of legation for some special reason, they find no difficulty at all in doing it. When anybody else comes in here, they say, "If you raise the salary of one of these men, as you propose to do, everybody else's salary must be raised."

In that way there is a deadlock in legislation upon this very important subject; and I want to draw the attention of the country as well as that of the Senate to the facts. I want the country to know who is responsible for the fact that the consular service and the secretaries of legation of the United States are put in such shape by our legislation that they can not make a decent support while they are filling these places. "But," said the Senator from Missouri, "I have never yet known one to resign." Neither did the Senator ever know a Senator to resign, and yet there are Senators in this Chamber who do not attend upon the deliberations of this body one day in every twenty-five. We sit here and know it and understand it perfectly well and pair with them, and they do not come here one day in twenty-five, either to vote or to do anything else of a legislative character.

As suggested by the Senator from New Hampshire, I could farm out my seat in the Senate of the United States to a thousand men in Alabama who would discharge my duties as well as they know how for a thousand dollars a year, and do it easily enough. But that is not the practice of the Government of the United States. That is not the theory upon which men are compensated for public service. The theory we have here now and the practice is that a poor man can not hold office. We make the salaries so miserably mean, cut them down to such a degrading extent, that a man who has not resources to draw upon can not afford to represent the United States in many of these positions that are called "honorable" positions, but are only fit for starvelings or paupers.

There ought to be something done about this matter, and that is one of the complaints I have to make against this great committee of the Senate, that they will not, unless moved thereto by a consideration satisfactory to them personally, make any movement for the relief of the public service. Here is the public service in South America and in various other places, the consular service and the service of secretaries of legations, assistants to our legations abroad, degraded, cut down, and put into the hands of men who are sent there, if they go at all, usually because they have either fathers or some backing or other that will enable them to pay their expenses or a large part of their expenses while they enjoy the honor of being secretary of legation, engaged in the social elegancies of these foreign places.

A secretary of legation sent from the United States, for instance, to Buenos Ayres, which is one of the most expensive cities on the whole Western Hemisphere, is bound to perform his duties socially. That, indeed, usually is the main part of his business there. It is to keep up the reputation of the legation for elegant courtesy, for the dispensation of the elegant hospitalities and the like of that of our ministers who go abroad. An ordinary poor man can not afford to do it, and the practice of this great committee is merely a condemnation of a man who has not a father or friend to back him with money so that he shall not enter even at the lowest rung of the ladder with the view of pulling himself up.

The young gentleman I speak of was educated at Heidelberg, educated at Paris, educated in one of the universities of the United States, and he came off with distinguished honors from all of these universities. There is not so well an educated man in the Senate to-day as he is, and there ar , very few who are abler. He happens to be a man who has some little estate, which his widowed mother divides with him—not much; very little—but he has a desire to be in the service of the United States Government. He was taken as a clerk in the Department here and educated himself thoroughly in all of the clerical duties of the State Department.

When he got to a point where the State Department thought he ought to be connected with the diplomatic service, being a very competent and very able man, not merely as a translator of Spanish, French, and German, but otherwise, they suggested to him service on a legation. He did so. To get to his point at Buenos Ayres he has to sail across the Atlantic Ocean, down the coast of Africa to about one-half the length of that continent, then across to Rio Janeiro, and then down to Buenos Ayres. By the time he gets through with his journey he has occupied scarcely less than thirty days of his time, thirty days going and thirty days coming. And he could not, in the commonest possible way, unless he took steerage passage, get there for less than $500. He gets a salary of $1,500. This is simply one of these wrongs. More than that, the men who live very much nearer to the United States and who occupy similar positions get $1,800, the sum I ask for these three secretaries of legation.

Mr. President, I do not think this subject ought to be put off in this way at all. I do not think the committee have a right to ask the Senate not to consider this question because they are unwilling to come up and make some impression upon the appropriations due to these men from the Treasury of the United States. Suppose they do not like it. Suppose, in their great anxiety to save money to the Treasury of the United States, they are willing to starve an honest gentleman who is out on the service of his country. The Senate ought not to be willing to do it, and the Committee on Appropriations, inasmuch as they have got in their grasp all the powers of appropriations in this body, ought at least to show some little spirit of relaxation in cases such as that presented by the Senator from Illinois, where, obviously, there is a high duty resting upon us to do justice to an honest, upright gentleman who is working to serve his country.

I intend that the country shall understand this thing and who is responsible for it. I, as a member of the Committee on Foreign Relations, have tried time and again, by assisting others in reporting bills here, to relieve these obvious and discreditable conditions. I have tried it. You can not get any action upon those bills. Now comes the committee and challenges the Committee on Foreign Relations, and asks, "Why do you not report bills?" We do. I ask them what alarm have they got about the condition of the Treasury of the United States that they can not afford to give $900 out of the Treasury to three gentlemen down here who are representing this Government in these important positions? What sudden alarm have they got about this $900 that causes them to withdraw? Why do they shrink from the tremendous duty of voting $900 to three secretaries of legation in South America who need it, and who ask for it, when the Secretary of State comes here and supplicates us to pass these bills.

Now, I take issue with the committee. I think that this amendment, being in order, ought to be put upon the pending bill, and it is a shame and a disgrace to this country for Senators to get up here and say that they have never known a man who had one of these offices who did not want an increase of salary, and that he was willing to accept it at the time he took it. Suppose he was. Does a man never grow in office, does he never grow in experience, does he not become more and more capacitated for the service of his country as he stays longer in office? Are we to throw his services away or to starve him because at one time one committee has fixed his salary at $1,500 a year, which does not compensate him except at the ordinary rate that a hackman would get in the city where he is representing the Government of the United States? No, sir; we ought to march out of this condition. We have been locked into it here to my knowledge for twenty-two years, for I have been on this floor that long, and during all that time I have heard this very same objection made. The way to get at it is to unlock it, and let the Committee on Appropriations understand that the Senate has a right to an opinion upon these questions as well as they have. I therefore call for the yeas and nays upon the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. FAULKNER in the chair). The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN].

Mr. HALE. I make the point of order, Mr. President.

Mr. MORGAN. I just stated, and the RECORD shows, that I offered the amendment at the instance of the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. HALE. Has the Committee on Foreign Relations reported the amendment?

Mr. MORGAN. It has.

Mr. HALE. I am desirous of getting the bill through the Senate, and I will take no further time. Let the vote be taken.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Alabama, on which the yeas and nays have been demanded.

Mr. HALE (to Mr. MORGAN). Withdraw the demand for the yeas and nays.

Mr. MORGAN. I withdraw it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Alabama.

Mr. PETTIGREW. I should like to hear the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 4, line 18, it is proposed, after the word "Venezuela," to insert "and," and after the word "Peru" to insert "at $1,800 each;" so that if amended the paragraph will read:

Secretaries of legations to Argentine Republic, Venezuela, and Peru, at $1,800 each; Liberia and Korea, $1,500 each—$8,400.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, as I stated a moment ago, the State Department in its estimates recommended that a salary of $2,000 should be paid to the consul at La Guaira, Venezuela. I move to amend the bill by striking out "$1,500" and inserting "$2,000."

Mr. HALE. I make the point of order against the amendment. Is the amendment reported by the Committee on Foreign Relations?

Mr. GALLINGER. It is not; but it is recommended by the head of a Department.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. After line 6, on page 18, it is proposed to insert:

Venezuela:
Consul at La Guaira.

Mr. HALE. I make the point of order against the amendment.

Mr. GALLINGER. I call attention to the last clause of Rule XVI, which provides:

Or unless the same be moved by direction of a standing or select committee of the Senate, or proposed in pursuance of an estimate of the head of some one of the Departments.

I wish to ask the Senator from Maine if it was not proposed——

Mr. HALE. I do not think the recommendation of the Secretary is in any way the foundation for changing law. All of these salaries are fixed by law, and the fact that the head of a Department has estimated for an increase does not, in my judgment, take it out.

Mr. GALLINGER. It seems to me the Senator from Maine can not have read this rule very carefully of late:

And no amendments shall be received to any general appropriation bill the effect of which will be to increase an appropriation already contained in the bill, or to add a new item of appropriation, unless it be made to carry out the provisions of some existing law, or treaty stipulation, or act, or resolution previously passed by the Senate during that session; or unless the same be moved by direction of a standing or select committee of the Senate, or proposed in pursuance of an estimate of the head of some one of the Departments.

I think a point of order will not lie in this case.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is of the opinion that the point of order is not well taken. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from New Hampshire.

Mr. HALE. I am told that it is not estimated for.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If it is not estimated for——

Mr. GALLINGER. Of course, if the Senator from Maine says it is not estimated for—my information is that it is——

Mr. HALE. My information is from the Clerk. He has the list. [A pause.] I am wrong; it is estimated for.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from New Hampshire.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. DAVIS. I offer an amendment reported from the Committee on Commerce.

The SECRETARY. On page 21, line 25, it is proposed to strike out the word "one" and insert "three," and in the same line to strike out the word "six" and insert "two;" so that it will read:

Paris, $3,200.

Mr. HALE. Is this recommended by a committee?

Mr. DAVIS. By the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. HALE. Was it reported from that committee?

Mr. DAVIS. It was reported from that committee.

Mr. CULLOM. Is it estimated for?

Mr. GALLINGER. It does not require both.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Minnesota.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CULLOM. I ask the Secretary to turn to the Collingwood agency. I desire to offer an amendment to that paragraph, wherever it may be found in the bill—I have not the bill before me—so that the consul there may be allowed a salary of $2,000, instead of being paid as he is.

Mr. HALE. I suggest to the Senator that he put it in on page 16. In line 24, after the word "Chatham," insert "Collingwood." That would be the formal amendment. I am not in favor of the amendment.

Mr. CULLOM. I hope there will be no opposition to this amendment, in view of the turn affairs have taken. I believe there is no action which can be taken with reference to salaries more meritorious than this.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed, on page 16, line 24, after the word "Chatham," to insert the word "Collingwood."

Mr. CULLOM. That is in the $2,000 list.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Should "Collingwood" be stricken out anywhere else?

Mr. CULLOM. That will be taken care of if the amendment is adopted.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Illinois.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. I move an amendment by striking out "Naples," in line 11, page 19, and inserting, after line 13, on page 15, the words:

Italy:
Consul at Naples.

Mr. HALE. I make the point of order that the amendment is not in order unless it is estimated for or reported from a committee.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. A one-thousand-dollar increase is estimated for in the Book of Estimates.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. After line 21, on page 15, it is proposed to insert:

Italy:
Consul at Naples.

And strike out the word "Naples" in line 11, on page 19.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair understands that the increase is estimated for.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. It is estimated for at $1,000 additional to what it is now. In the bill it is put the same that it is now. Transferring it makes it $1,000 more than it is. It is estimated for by the Secretary of State in the Book of Estimates.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Connecticut.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. GALLINGER. The consul at Pernambuco, Brazil, is estimated at $2,500, and the bill allows him $2,000. I move to transfer Pernambuco from the $2,000 list to the $2,500 list.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 16, line 12, it is proposed to strike out "consuls" and insert "consul;" after "Bahia" to insert "and;" after "Para" to strike out "and Pernambuco;" on page 15, line 6, to strike out "consul" and insert "consuls," and after "Santos" to insert "and Pernambuco."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from New Hampshire.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HALE. I ask unanimous consent that the Secretary be authorized to correct the footings of the clauses in which changes of appropriation have been made.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That order will be made, in the absence of objection.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

CAPT. ROBERT W. DOWDY.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President——

Mr. TURLEY. Will the Senator from Georgia yield to me for a moment?

Mr. BACON. Certainly.

Mr. TURLEY. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 11036) to restore Capt. Robert W. Dowdy to the active list of the Army. It is a short bill, containing only a few lines.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which had been reported from the Committee on Military Affairs with an amendment, in line 3, after the word "authorized," to strike out the words "and directed;" so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the President be, and he is hereby, authorized to restore Robert W. Dowdy to the active list of the Army of the United States, with the same rank and relative position he would hold if he had not been retired.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The amendment was ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

POLICY REGARDING THE PHILIPPINE ISLANDS.

Mr. BACON. I move that the Senate take up for consideration and action at such time as it may determine, the joint resolution S. R. 211.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Georgia moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of a joint resolution, which will be read by title.

The SECRETARY. A joint resolution (S. R. 211) relative to the acquisition of foreign territory.

Mr. CULLOM. I desire to inquire whether if that joint resolution is taken up by the action of the Senate it displaces the regular order at 2 o'clock, which is the anti-scalping bill?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will inform the Senator from Illinois that it does not.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. I desire to inquire whether the taking up of the joint resolution under the motion of the Senator from Georgia makes it in order to-morrow morning during the morning hour.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It does not. It will not be in order to-morrow, unless it is taken up by a motion or by unanimous consent.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, I desire to have the joint resolution taken up, in order that the Senate may give some direction as to the time when it may be disposed of. I desire to submit to Senators that when we agreed to take a vote on the treaty at a certain time, which is a public matter, we certainly understood that we should have a reasonable opportunity for a vote of the Senate upon matters which pertain to that proceeding on the part of the Senate. I think it is nothing but fair, in view of the situation, that the Senate should determine when it will vote upon the joint resolution, and that is the object I have in now calling it up. I do not desire to occupy the time of the Senate in any remarks upon the resolutions, and, so far as I know, I shall not do so unless something is said by those who oppose the resolutions which may require some reply.

Mr. FORAKER. I inquire of the Senator from Georgia if there was not a time fixed yesterday for voting upon the resolution introduced by the Senator from Illinois [Mr. MASON].

Mr. BACON. No, sir.

Mr. FORAKER. I was absent from the Chamber, but I understood a time had been fixed for a vote upon that resolution.

Mr. BACON. No time whatever has been fixed. The Senator from Illinois gave notice that he would call up the resolution for the purpose of having some time fixed.

Mr. President, I simply state to Senators that that is the object which I have. Of course the time that we now have is very limited. I should like to have the Senate take up the resolutions for such disposition as the Senate may then determine upon.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. The Senate is very thin at this hour and the Senator from Georgia ought not to ask in so thin a Senate that a time shall be fixed for voting upon this joint resolution. The resolution is but one of four resolutions which have been introduced looking to the same or a similar object, that is to say, the declaration of some policy by the Senate as to how newly acquired territory shall be governed. But these four resolutions are all distinct and different in the method proposed for dealing with such territory. The Senator from Georgia now asks to have his resolution taken up and a time fixed for a vote on all four resolutions, I understand.

Mr. BACON. No, sir.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. Though he makes no request——

Mr. BACON. No.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. He said there ought to be a time fixed for voting on these resolutions. That is what the Senator said.

Mr. BACON. I am speaking of the joint resolution which I introduced.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Connecticut yield to the Senator from South Carolina.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. I must, I suppose. I had just commenced what I wanted to say.

Mr. TILLMAN. I simply rose to ask if the motion to take up the joint resolution is debatable.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair would rule that it is not debatable.

Mr. HOAR. Let us get the joint resolution up, then.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. I supposed that the joint resolution was before the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. No, it is not.

Mr. HOAR. I hope we shall have unanimous consent to take it up. The Chair has already stated that if it is taken up by unanimous consent it will operate for only ten minutes.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. There is no objection.

Mr. HOAR. No harm will be done, and the Senator from Connecticut will then proceed in order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Massachusetts asks unanimous consent that the joint resolution be read and laid before the Senate. Is there objection?

Mr. NELSON. I object.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair hears no objection, and the joint resolution is before the Senate.

Mr. TILLMAN. I was just going to remark before the Chair made that statement that if the joint resolution is taken up I want to ask the Chair whether, if it is taken up by unanimous consent, it does not by the rule go to the foot of the Calendar at 2 o'clock?

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. The joint resolution is on the Calendar now, I understand.

Mr. TILLMAN. It is on the table now.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The joint resolution is now on the table, and at 2 o'clock it would, under the rules of the Senate, go to the regular Calendar.

Mr. HOAR. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry. I think my friend from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON] does not understand what the Chair has already said. If there be unanimous consent to take the joint resolution up, will not the only practical effect be to make the remarks of the Senator from Connecticut in order and will not the joint resolution go back to the table at 2 o'clock, in ten minutes?

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. That course could be agreed to, at any rate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair would hold that if the unanimous-consent agreement included the putting of the joint resolution back on the table at 2 o'clock, it could be done by unanimous consent; but otherwise at 2 o'clock the joint resolution would go to the Calendar.

Mr. HOAR. Very well.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. There is no objection to that course, I think.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request as modified, that the joint resolution be now taken up and that at the hour of 2 o'clock it lie on the table? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered. The Senator from Connecticut will proceed.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. Mr. President, I will then proceed very briefly, as I must, with what I have to say.

I have no objection to voting upon any or all these resolutions when a fair time can have been given for their discussion. I have very decided convictions that we ought not to pass them at all while the treaty, which has been made public and which I may therefore speak of, is pending in the Senate.

I do not, however, desire to elaborate at this time my views upon that subject, but simply to say that I protest against the pressure of these resolutions upon the Senate for a vote without ample time being given for their discussion. I had the honor at an early period in the session to make some remarks upon the joint resolution introduced by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST] relating to the right of the Government to acquire, hold, and govern territory. I felt embarrassed at that time by the fact that no treaty had been made public; that a treaty was to be considered in secret session; and that it was not proper for me at that time to discuss the question as to how territory which we might acquire should be dealt with. I have had no opportunity for that discussion. I agree that the debate in the Senate has run into a discussion of that question; but before any resolutions are acted upon defining the future policy of this Government with reference to territory acquired in the near or remote future I want an opportunity for a full and fair discussion. That is all I desire to say on the subject this morning.

Mr. MASON. Mr. President, I judge, from the statement made by the distinguished Senator from Connecticut, that he desires to be heard upon either the resolution which I offered or some of the kindred resolutions before the vote upon the treaty is had. I want to suggest to him that those people who have any doubt about the propriety of all the terms of the treaty have given unanimous consent to have that vote taken one week from Monday, and there is still all of next week in which he can be heard.

I simply do not want to be put in a position where it may be said that I have crowded a vote upon my resolution, which was introduced before the treaty was reported, and which has been pending, and upon notice which I gave. In order that there may be no misunderstanding, I will state that before the agreement was made to vote upon the treaty I gave notice that I should ask for a vote upon that resolution.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, it is evident that nothing can be done in the short interval between now and 2 o'clock, and therefore I will not ask for the further consideration of the joint resolution.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. The joint resolution goes to the table the same as before it was taken up.

Mr. BACON. Yes; just the same as if it had not been called up.

TICKET BROKERAGE.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, the Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. A bill (S. 1575) to amend an act entitled "An act to regulate commerce."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Under the unanimous agreement of the Senate the Senate will take a recess until half past 3 o'clock.

RECESS.

The Senate (at 2 p. m.) took a recess until 3.30 p. m., at which time it reassembled.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. DAVIS. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After one hour and thirty-five minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened.

DISTRIBUTION OF APPROPRIATION BILLS.

Mr. ALDRICH called up the following amendment to the standing rules of the Senate, reported by him yesterday from the Committee on Rules; and it was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Amend the first section of Rule XVI of the standing rules of the Senate so as to read as follows, this amendment to take effect at the beginning of the Fifty-sixth Congress:

"All general appropriation bills shall be referred to the Committee on Appropriations, except the following bills, which shall be severally referred as herein indicated, namely: The bill making appropriations for rivers and harbors, to the Committee on Commerce; the Agricultural bill, to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry; the Army and the Military Academy bills, to the Committee on Military Affairs; the Indian bill, to the Committee on Indian Affairs; the naval bill, to the Committee on Naval Affairs; the pension bill, to the Committee on Pensions; the Post-Office bill, to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads; and no amendments shall be received to any general appropriation bill the effect of which will be to increase an appropriation already contained in the bill, or to add a new item of appropriation, unless it be made to carry out the provisions of some existing law, or treaty stipulation, or act or resolution previously passed by the Senate during that session; or unless the same be moved by direction of a standing or select committee of the Senate, or proposed in pursuance of an estimate of the head of some one of the Departments.

DANIEL STRAW.

Mr. GALLINGER. I ask the Senate to proceed to the consideration of the bill (H. R. 2274) to remove the charge of desertion from the military record of Daniel Straw, late private, Company F, Twenty-sixth Massachusetts Volunteers.

There being no objection, the bill was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

NATIONAL CELEBRATION IN 1900.

Mr. HOAR. I am directed by the Select Committee on the Anniversary of the Foundation of the City of Washington, D. C., to report a bill and to ask for its present consideration.

The bill (S. 5391) to provide for an appropriate national celebration of the establishment of the seat of government in the District of Columbia was read the first time by its title and the second time at length, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., The President is authorized to appoint a committee from the country at large, of such number as he shall think proper, to act with any committees that may be appointed by the two Houses of Congress or either of them, and with any committee that may be appointed from the citizens of the District of Columbia, who may prepare plans for an appropriate national celebration, in the year 1900, of the first session of Congress in the District and the establishment of the seat of Government therein. Said committee shall report their proceedings to the President, to be by him communicated to Congress.

SEC. 2. The actual expenses of the members of said committee shall be paid by the Secretary of the Treasury on vouchers to be approved by the Secretary of the Interior.

SEC. 3. The sum of $10,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, is hereby appropriated, from any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to carry into effect the second section of this act.

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

Mr. PETTUS. In section 2, line 2, after the word "committee," I move to insert "so appointed by the President."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

HEALTH OF SOLDIERS IN PHILIPPINE ISLANDS.

Mr. MASON. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the resolution which I send to the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. CHANDLER in the chair). The Senator from Illinois asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of the resolution presented by him, which will be read for the information of the Senate.

The Secretary read the resolution, as follows:

Whereas a large number of the sailors and soldiers of the United States are now in the Philippine Islands, or on their way there; and

Whereas there are differing newspaper reports as to the condition of the health of the soldiers and sailors; and

Whereas it is reported by the press that a large percentage of those who are made sick by reason of the climate of said islands; and

Whereas it is stated upon good medical authority that during the late years as high as 50 per cent of the soldiers unaccustomed to that climate have died by reason of the said climate: Therefore, be it

Resolved, That the Surgeon-General of the Army be requested to furnish for the information of the Senate a statement as to the percentage of our soldiers who are sick and have been sick, and the number of deaths in our Army by reason of the sickness caused by the climate, and to set forth when, according to the generally accepted term, the sickly season begins in the said islands.

And further, That he will give to the Senate the benefit of his opinion as to the number of deaths that will occur in our Army before the end of the next sickly season, his opinion to be based upon his experience and the information within his possession.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

Mr. GALLINGER. I do not think I shall object to the consideration of the resolution, yet it strikes me that it will not be very valuable information when the Surgeon-General of the Army guesses how many soldiers are going to die during the sick season in the Philippine Islands or in any other part of the known world. I think the Senator might, with propriety, leave out that paragraph of the resolution. I think the resolution will be stronger if he leaves that portion out; but still I have no objection to the present consideration of the resolution.

Mr. MASON. If the Senator has no objection, I should like to have the resolution considered and passed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

Mr. ALDRICH. I ask that the resolution be again read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The resolution will be again read.

The Secretary again read the resolution.

Mr. ALDRICH. I think that resolution had better go to the Committee on Military Affairs. I do not like to ask the Surgeon-General his opinion as to how many deaths are likely to occur in the next year.

Mr. MASON. Then I will amend the resolution; and if the Senator is in good faith, he will not object to it after I amend it.

Mr. ALDRICH. Very well.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Illinois desire to modify the resolution before the Chair asks if there is objection to its present consideration?

Mr. MASON. I should like to first know whether there is objection to its consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Illinois desires to know whether there is objection to the consideration of the resolution before he modifies it, as the Chair understands.

Mr. ALDRICH. I do not object to asking the Surgeon-General for any facts which may be in his possession, but I do object to asking him his opinion as to what will happen in the future in the Philippine Islands or anywhere else. That would be a mere matter of speculation.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution as it is proposed to be modified?

Mr. TELLER. How is it proposed to be modified?

Mr. ALDRICH. Let the resolution be read for information as it is proposed to be modified.

Mr. MASON. As I understand, there is objection to the consideration of the resolution as it stands, and so I will let it lie upon the table if there is objection to it in its present form, and I will draw another resolution. I understand it takes unanimous consent to have the resolution considered now. I am very anxious to get information on this subject. I have seen different reports as to the situation there, some saying that it is a very healthy climate. I should like to know for my own information not only the cost in money of the war we are to make against the Filipinos, but the cost in life, and I do not know of any better way than to ask the Surgeon-General when the sickly season begins, and what, based upon experience, history, and everything else within his knowledge, is his opinion on this matter. I am told that 55 per cent of the Spanish soldiers died who had never participated in an engagement.

Mr. HOAR. May I make a suggestion?

Mr. MASON. Yes; I shall be very thankful.

Mr. HOAR. I do not think there has ever been an instance known to any Senator in the body in which a request has been directed to any Department of the Government except to the President himself. In all other cases there are directions given.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The resolution is not yet before the Senate.

Mr. HOAR. I am speaking by unanimous consent, as I am aware that the resolution has not been taken up.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair supposed the Senator was through.

Mr. HOAR. I desire to say one word more.

A direction is always given to the head of a Department, who commands his subordinates. So in this case the Secretary of War, it seems to me, should be directed to furnish this information and to furnish the opinion of the Surgeon-General, if that is desired.

Mr. MASON. Very well.

Mr. HOAR. The Senator will see that to have subordinate officers, however eminent, as they are in this case, giving their own opinions to Congress might involve a conflict between them and the head of their own Department in their recommendations.

Mr. MASON. I understand there is objection to the present consideration of the resolution.

Mr. HAWLEY. I object to the consideration of the resolution now. It ought to be revised.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Connecticut will suspend a moment. The Chair understood the mover of the resolution to say that he himself desired that it should go over.

Mr. MASON. Yes; that is to say, it goes over under objection. I simply give notice that I shall introduce another resolution that may go the usual course, to the deadhouse, known as a committee.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

Mr. HAWLEY. There is. I object.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Objection being made, the resolution goes over.

USE OF VOTING MACHINES.

Mr. SPOONER. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of Senate bill 5088.

Mr. COCKRELL. I think it is nearly time to adjourn.

Mr. SPOONER. I hope the Senator will not object. The bill to which I refer is a short one, reported from the Committee on Privileges and Elections.

Mr. COCKRELL. What is it?

Mr. SPOONER. It simply has this effect: It authorizes the States, if they see fit to do so, to use a voting machine in the election of members of Congress.

Mr. COCKRELL. All right.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Wisconsin asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of a bill the title of which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. A bill (S. 5088) to amend section 27, chapter 2, of the laws of 1871 (amended 1872), entitled "Apportionment and election of Representatives."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which had been reported from the Committee on Privileges and Elections with amendments, on page 1, line 3, after the word "twenty-seven," to strike out:

Chapter 2 (Title II—The Congress) of the laws of 1871 (amended 1872), relating to the apportionment and election of Representatives, being section 27, chapter 2.

In line 8, after the date "1878," to strike out "page 5;" in line 9, after the word "amended," to insert "so as;" in line 2, before the word "law," to insert "the State," and in line 4, after the word "effect," to strike out:

But this section shall not apply to any State voting otherwise whose election for Representatives occurs previous to the regular meeting of its legislature next after the 28th day of February, 1871.

Mr. HOAR. Is the phrase which the Secretary read, "but this section shall not apply to any State voting otherwise," etc., still in the bill?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will read the bill as proposed to be amended.

The SECRETARY. The bill, if amended as proposed, will read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That section 27 of the Revised Statutes of the United States of 1878 be amended so as to read as follows:

"All votes for Representatives in Congress must be by written or printed ballot, or voting machine the use of which has been duly authorized by the State law; and all votes received or recorded contrary to this section shall be of no effect."

Mr. HAWLEY. With reference to the phrase "All votes for Representatives in Congress must be by written or printed ballot," I wish to ask, is there anybody who votes nowadays viva voce for members of Congress in great popular elections?

Mr. SPOONER. The Senator must remember that that is simply the law as it stands now and as it has stood for a great many years. The only change made by this bill in the existing law is this. The law reads now:

All votes for Representatives in Congress must be by written or printed ballot.

We insert the words "or voting machine the use of which has been duly authorized by the State law." That is the only change which is made. It leaves the matter to the States.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendments reported by the Committee on Privileges and Elections, which have been read.

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The title was amended so as to read: "A bill to amend section 27 of the Revised Statutes, relative to the apportionment and election of Representatives."

MARY L. RODERICK.

Mr. HAWLEY. I move that the Senate adjourn.

Mr. GALLINGER. I appeal to the Senator from Connecticut to withdraw the motion. There are some Senate bills on the table, with minor amendments made by the House of Representatives, which I should like very much to have acted on. They will take but a few minutes at most.

Mr. COCKRELL. They are pension bills.

Mr. HAWLEY. I withdraw my motion.

Mr. GALLINGER. I ask that the bills which are on the table may be laid before the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER laid before the Senate the amendment of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 285) granting a pension to Mary L. Roderick, which was, in line 8, after the word "twelve," to insert "and pay her a pension at the rate of $12 per month."

Mr. COCKRELL. I move that the bill be indefinitely postponed. The person proposed to be pensioned by it has died since the passage of the bill through the Senate and since it went to the House of Representatives. That is my information, and I do not think that I am mistaken. The applicant was quite an old lady. When the bill passed the Senate I sent her copies of it and of the report, together with a memorandum that it had passed the Senate. My letter was returned to me marked "deceased." I then sent another to a friend who had been doing the correspondence with me, and it was returned in the same way, and I have heard nothing further. Therefore I do not think the bill ought to be allowed to pass.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Missouri, that the bill be indefinitely postponed.

The motion was agreed to.

GEORGE W. GOULD.

The PRESIDING OFFICER laid before the Senate the amendment of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 4422) granting an increase of pension to George W. Gould, which was, in line 6, to strike out the word "First" and insert "Ninth."

Mr. GALLINGER. I move that the Senate agree to the amendment made by the House of Representatives.

The motion was agreed to.

WILLIAM RUSSELL.

The PRESIDING OFFICER laid before the Senate the amendments of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 3002) to pension William Russell for services in Oregon Indian wars, which were, in line 5, after the initial "H," to insert "Second;" and in line 8, to strike out "in August, 1856."

Mr. GALLINGER. I move that the Senate concur in the amendments of the House of Representatives.

The motion was agreed to.

BYRON R. PIERCE.

The PRESIDING OFFICER laid before the Senate the amendment of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 2002) granting an increase of pension to Byron R. Pierce, which was, in line 8, to strike out "fifty" and insert "thirty."

Mr. GALLINGER. I move concurrence in the amendment of the House of Representatives.

The motion was agreed to.

JOHN GREEN.

The PRESIDING OFFICER laid before the Senate the amendment of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 1183) for the relief of John Green, which was to amend the title so as to read: "An act granting a pension to John Green."

Mr. GALLINGER. I move that the Senate concur in the amendment of the House of Representatives.

The motion was agreed to.

EVA W. BRANNAN.

The PRESIDING OFFICER laid before the Senate the amendments of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 717) granting an increase of pension to Eva W. Brannan, which were, in line 6, to strike out "Major-General" and insert "Brigadier-General;" and in line 7, to strike out "Army" and insert "Volunteers."

Mr. GALLINGER. I move that the Senate concur in the amendments of the House of Representatives.

The motion was agreed to.

CHARLOTTE POE.

The PRESIDING OFFICER laid before the Senate the amendment of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 290) granting a pension to Charlotte Poe, which was, in line 8, after the word "twelve," to insert "and pay her a pension at the rate of $12 per month."

Mr. GALLINGER. I move concurrence in the amendment of the House of Representatives.

The motion was agreed to.

HENRY FARMER.

The PRESIDING OFFICER laid before the Senate the amendment of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 304) granting a pension to Henry Farmer, which was, in line 8, after the word "war," to insert "and pay him a pension at the rate of $8 per month."

Mr. GALLINGER. I move that the Senate concur in the amendment of the House of Representatives.

Mr. COCKRELL. Is that the rate allowed in such cases?

Mr. GALLINGER. That is the legal rate for the class of pensioners to which the applicant belongs.

Mr. COCKRELL. Very well.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER] to concur in the amendment of the House of Representatives.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. GALLINGER. I move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 5 o'clock and 24 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until Monday, January 30, 1899, at 12 o'clock meridian.

SUITS AGAINST HEADS OF DEPARTMENTS.

Mr. CONNOLLY. Mr. Speaker, I present a conference report on the bill (H. R. 6901) to prevent the abatement of certain actions.

The Clerk read as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 6901) to prevent the abatement of certain actions, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

The House recede from its nonconcurrence with the Senate amendments, and concur therein with an amendment as follows: Strike out all the text of said amendment and substitute as follows:

"That no suit, action, or other proceeding, lawfully commenced by or against the head of any Department or bureau or other officer of the United States, in his official capacity or in relation to the discharge of his official duties, shall abate by reason of his death, or the expiration of his term of office, or his retirement or resignation or removal from office; but, in such event, the court, on motion or supplemental petition filed, at any time within twelve months thereafter, showing a necessity for the survival thereof to obtain a settlement of the questions involved, may allow the same to be maintained by or against his successor in office, and the court may make such order as shall be equitable for the payment of costs."

And the Senate agree to the same.

APPOINTMENT OF CADET TO WEST POINT FROM VENEZUELA.

Mr. HULL. Mr. Speaker, I have a resolution transmitted by the State Department to comply with the request of the Venezuelan Government to appoint a cadet from that Government to West Point without expense to the United States. The reading of the papers will make it perfectly clear to members. It is to grant the usual permission to the Venezuelan Government to appoint a cadet from that country to West Point, a courtesy that has always been extended to South American Republics when asked of this Government.

The Clerk read as follows:

Joint resolution granting authority to the Republic of Venezuela to send a cadet to West Point Military Academy.

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized to permit Andrés Ponte-Ruego, of Venezuela, to receive instruction at the Military Academy, at West Point: Provided, That no expense shall be caused to the United States thereby: And provided further, That in the case of the said Ponte-Ruego the provisions of sections 1320 and 1321 of the Revised Statutes shall be suspended.

[Translation.]

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES OF VENEZUELA,
Washington, D. C., January 11, 1899.

SIR: The President of Venezuela has instructed me to solicit from the Government of the United States the position of student at the Military Academy of West Point for a young Venezuelan, Andrés Ponte-Ruego. I beg your excellency to have the kindness to give this request the usual course in such cases, and to favor it, if possible, by your valuable recommendation.

Accept, excellency, in advance my sincere thanks and the renewed assurance of my most distinguished consideration.

JOSÉ ANDRADE.

His Excellency JOHN HAY, etc.

WAR DEPARTMENT, Washington, January 20, 1899.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of the 18th instant, inclosing copy of a note from the minister of Venezuela at this capital, requesting, in pursuance of instructions from his Government, permission for Andrés Ponte-Ruego to enter the Military Academy at West Point as a student, together with your request for information as to whether this Department has objection to application being made for the necessary legislation in the case.

Replying thereto, I beg to inform you that if your Department deems it advisable, for public considerations, that this Government should comply with the wishes of the Republic of Venezuela in the matter, there appears to be no objection to admitting the youth into the Academy, provided no expense is caused the United States and that the necessary Congressional authority shall be obtained.

In like previous cases a joint resolution of Congress has been obtained through your Department, and the representative at this capital of the government applying for the privilege has looked after the necessary details with the Academy authorities.

Very respectfully,

R. A. ALGER,
Secretary of War.

The SECRETARY OF STATE.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, Washington, January 26, 1899.

SIR: In compliance with the request of the Government of Venezuela, made known through its minister at this capital, and with the consent of the Secretary of War, I have the honor to inclose the draft of a resolution authorizing the Secretary of War to receive Andrés Ponte-Ruego as a student at the Military Academy at West Point, at the expense of the Government of Venezuela, and to request that the measure be reported to the House at the earliest practicable date with a view to its speedy passage.

The resolution follows the precise language of that used in previous similar cases.

A translation of the note of the minister of Venezuela making the request and a copy of the letter from the Secretary of War giving his consent are also inclosed.

I have the honor to be, sir, your obedient servant,

JOHN HAY.

Hon. JOHN A. T. HULL,
Chairman Committee on Military Affairs, House of Representatives.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. I wish to inquire of the chairman of the Military Committee how many of these South American Republics now have representatives at the Military Academy?

Mr. HULL. I have no exact information on that point. I remember that this House passed a bill giving this authority in the case of one of these Republics, and I think the same thing has been done in three or four other cases, but I do not undertake to speak positively. That fact, however, makes no difference as to this case. This is a courtesy which this South American Republic asks and one which has never been denied when it has been asked.

A MEMBER. And it entails no expense?

Mr. HULL. No; it entails no expense.

There being no objection, the House proceeded to the consideration of the joint resolution, which was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

SENATE BILLS REFERRED.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, Senate bills and joint resolution of the following titles were taken from the Speaker's table and referred to their appropriate committees as indicated below:

S. 4549. An act authorizing the British Columbia, Seattle and Pacific Coast Railway Company to construct a bridge across the Columbia River—to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

S. R. 231. Joint resolution providing for the further distribution of the compiled statutes of the District of Columbia—to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

S. 3357. An act for the relief of Clinton F. Pulsifer, of the State of Washington—to the Committee on Claims.

S. 5019. An act to prevent the failure of military justice, and for other purposes—to the Committee on the Judiciary.

S. 5130. An act to provide for the erection of a building for the Department of Justice—to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

S. 5144. An act authorizing and directing the Secretary of the Treasury to donate one set of life-saving beach apparatus to the Imperial Japanese Society for Saving Life from Shipwreck—to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

S. 5186. An act to amend an act entitled "An act to amend the statutes in relation to immediate transportation of dutiable goods, and for other purposes," approved June 10, A. D. 1880, by extending the privileges of the first section thereof to the subport of Miami, Fla.—to the Committee on Ways and Means.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

Mr. HAGER, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled bills of the following titles; when the Speaker signed the same:

H. R. 774. An act for the relief of Samuel D. Hubbard; and

H. R. 11116. An act to authorize the Little River Valley Railway Company to construct and operate a railway through the Choctaw and Chickasaw nations, in the Indian Territory, and branches thereof, and for other purposes.

BRIDGES OVER LAKE CHAMPLAIN.

Mr. POWERS. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of Senate bill No. 5191.

The bill (S. 5191) to authorize the construction of certain bridges over the waters of Lake Champlain was read.

Mr. POWERS. I desire to say that when I asked consent a few days since to call up this bill the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. MCEWAN] interposed some objection to some of its phraseology; and if the bill is considered now, I shall offer an amendment to meet his objections.

There being no objection, the House proceeded to the consideration of the bill.

Mr. POWERS. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend section 2 by striking out, in lines 14, 15, and 16, the words "beyond what is necessary in order to carry into effect the rights and privileges hereby granted."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. POWERS, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

BRIDGE ACROSS MISSOURI RIVER.

Mr. COWHERD. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of Senate bill 5047, and will state that a similar bill has been favorably reported by the committee of the House.

The bill (S. 5047) to revive, reenact, and amend an act to authorize the construction of a bridge across the Missouri River at or near the city of Lexington, Mo., was read.

There being no objection, the House proceeded to the consideration of the bill; which was ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. COWHERD, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

BROWNELL & CO.

Mr. BRENNER of Ohio. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of a bill (H. R. 599) authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to pay the sum of $400 to The Brownell & Co.,

Dayton, Ohio, on account of penalty erroneously imposed by the Light-House Board.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of funds not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $400 to The Brownell & Co., Dayton, Ohio, as a reimbursement of penalty erroneously imposed by the Light-House Board of the Treasury Department.

Mr. PAYNE. I think we should have some explanation to this.

Mr. BRENNER of Ohio. The Treasury Department has recommended the passage of the bill. I ask the Clerk to read the letter which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, Washington, D. C., January 20, 1899.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your reference to this Department for report and recommendation of H. R. 599, a bill authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to pay the sum of $400 to The Brownell & Co., Dayton, Ohio, on account of penalty erroneously imposed by the Light-House Board.

In reply I beg to state that the Light-House Board at its session of January 9, 1899, considered the subject and recommended the passage of the bill in question.

Respectfully, yours, O. L. SPAULDING,
Acting Secretary.

THE CHAIRMAN OF THE COMMITTEE ON CLAIMS,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

There being no objection, the House proceeded to the consideration of the bill, which was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. BRENNER of Ohio, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

ARMY REORGANIZATION.

Mr. HULL. Before we resume the consideration of the Army reorganization bill, I wish to ask that, on account of the fact that so few members are here, the amendments to be offered by the gentleman from Illinois may go over until Monday, if that part of the bill should be reached to-day, so that we may have a fuller vote upon them. In explanation of this request, I will state that a great many members are absent because they supposed that to-day would be taken up entirely with eulogies. We propose, however, to occupy a little time of the House this afternoon with the consideration of the bill, leaving those two amendments to be voted upon on Monday.

Mr. HAY. I do not wish to interpose any objection to the request of the gentleman from Iowa, if we can have an understanding as to what is the amendment to be offered by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MARSH].

As I understand it, his proposition is to reduce the infantry arm of the service by some sort of a sliding scale, whereby the President of the United States may exercise certain discretion and increase the number whenever he chooses to do so, and further, that the infantry and cavalry shall be subject to this same sliding scale.

I would like to see the changes the gentleman proposes to make, and know what they are, before this consent is given. I think we are entitled to have them presented to the House.

Mr. HULL. If my friend from Virginia will yield to me, and as the gentleman from Illinois is present, I am perfectly willing to let the amendments be offered, considered as pending, to be determined on next Monday.

Mr. HAY. Is there any objection to having the House informed as to what they are at this time?

Mr. HULL. Not at all.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Let it be printed in the RECORD.

Mr. HULL. I suppose the gentleman from Illinois has no objection to letting the House know exactly what amendments he proposes to offer, and let them be printed and stand over until Monday.

Mr. McCLELLAN. Will that cut off an opportunity for offering amendments to the amendments?

Mr. HULL. Oh, not at all.

Mr. DOCKERY. I would like the gentleman to explain the parliamentary situation. Suppose the consideration of the amendments are not concluded in the Committee of the Whole when the time comes for a final vote under the agreement, will the amendments be reported to the House with the bill?

Mr. HULL. Well, that is a parliamentary inquiry, a question for the Chair to determine. The gentleman knows as well as I do what the effect would be.

Mr. DOCKERY. I do not know what may be the opinion of the gentleman in charge of the matter, but this condition may arise. It seems to me that we might have amendments which were not considered at all in Committee of the Whole reported to the House for its action after the committee has risen. We should understand the question fully before consent is given.

Mr. HAY. I desire it to be distinctly understood, Mr. Speaker, that if the gentleman from Iowa submits his request in such shape that if granted in the Committee of the Whole it would have the effect of cutting off any amendment that might be offered to the amendment to which he refers, and that any member of the committee may desire to offer, objection would be made.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa might ask permission in Committee of the Whole, with reference to these particular items which are desired to be amended, that they be passed over. Would not that accomplish the object?

Mr. HULL. I have only asked, Mr. Speaker, that the amendments proposed to be offered with reference to the infantry and cavalry arm of the service—that is, fixing a minimum number—be passed over and the vote be taken upon them on Monday next.

Mr. HAY. If the gentleman puts the proposition in that form I shall have to object, because the effect would be to preclude us from offering any amendments whatever, if we desired to do so, to the amendments so carried over.

The SPEAKER. Objection is made.

Mr. HULL. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the purpose of considering the Army reorganization bill.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, Mr. PAYNE in the chair.

Mr. TODD. Mr. Chairman, I move the following amendment.

Mr. HULL. To what section; section 1?

The CHAIRMAN. To section 1. The amendment proposed by the gentleman from Michigan will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

At the end of section 1 insert:

"The President is hereby directed to recall the military and naval forces of the United States from the islands of the Philippines whenever the United States Government shall have evidence of the formation of a stable and independent government in those islands by the inhabitants thereof.

"The Army of the United States shall in time of peace consist of the same numbers as the peace footing authorized by existing law. And the President is hereby authorized and directed to use the State militia and to call for volunteers whenever the exigencies of the Government require additional troops."

Mr. HULL. I raise the point of order that that is entirely out of order. It is not germane.

Mr. TODD. I will admit that the point of order is good, and will move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. TODD. Mr. Chairman, from whatever point of view we look upon the pending measure to increase our standing army in time of peace to four times the numbers authorized by the present law, I am unable to find the shadow of an argument in its favor that will stand the test of enlightened reason and judgment, a proper conception of the safeguards of our Republic, or a patriotic consideration of the principles upon which the Constitution of our country is founded.

On the contrary, sir, a careful study of the appalling conditions already prevailing in this country, viewed in the light of the history of the great commonwealths which have preceded ours, teach us that what this nation most needs, if our Republic is to long survive, is to prevent the further destruction of civil liberty from within by gigantic domestic corporations who are fast usurping the sovereignty which both by divine right and the law of the land is vested in the people.

I am opposed to this measure for several momentous reasons, three of which I will name, and any one of which, in my judgment, should be deemed sufficient to defeat the proposed legislation.

1. The real purpose for which this great standing army is desired is to enforce despotic laws against citizens of the United States with a government "by injunction."

2. The pretended reason—viz, increased forces to subjugate the inhabitants of these islands, who have already adopted a republican government of their own—is a proposition too monstrous to be considered by those who are themselves enjoying the blessings of liberty in a republic whose foundations were laid in the blood of patriot ancestors who bared their breasts against foreign bayonets, giving their lives as willing sacrifices on the altar of human liberty, setting an illustrious example for all times, nations, and tongues, worthy to be emulated by the inhabitants of Cuba and the Philippines. [Applause.]

3. A great standing army will engender a spirit of militarism and lust for conquest, by which the minds of the American people will be diverted from the subversion of their own dearest rights by domestic rather than foreign foes.

The first of these dangers—the usurpation of sovereignty and the spoliation of the people by corporate power and monopolies—has already several times been discussed by me on the floor of this House, in which I have endeavored to point out the menace to our free institutions by this new and most dangerous form of sovereignty.

I shall, therefore, take this opportunity to enforce these views by quoting from a most eminent authority whose patriotic utterances and nonpartisan independence entitle his words to the highest respect, Hon. Hazen S. Pingree, recently reelected governor of Michigan on the Republican ticket. Should any of my Republican colleagues on this floor object that Governor Pingree is not a loyal and patriotic Republican, I ask you, In what respect does he differ from Lincoln and Sumner, or, if you please, from Washington and Jefferson, whose patriotism, like that of the founders of both the Democratic and Republican parties, and of the soldiers of the Revolution, "was not hemmed in by either State or party lines?"

Or if you should say that his views of what constitutes true republicanism and true patriotism are not shared by the majority of the people of the great State of Michigan and the best men of all parties throughout the nation, I ask you how it was that in the campaign of 1896 he received 27,300 more votes than did President McKinley upon the same ticket? And why was it that he was recently reelected by an overwhelming majority notwithstanding the fact that the Federal power and patronage of the Administration, with the untold millions of corporate wealth led by the railroad power, attempted by almost superhuman means to encompass his defeat? And notwithstanding that the opposing candidate was a most highly respected citizen and distinguished statesman, who served his State and nation with honor as a member of this House for four successive terms.

I accordingly invite your attention to some statements made by Governor Pingree vital to the subject we are now considering, which must arrest the attention of every thoughtful man who holds his country above his party. From his message to the legislature of Michigan, on the 9th day of the present month, I quote the following extracts:

"I have always been a loyal Republican. I am a Republican still. But I prefer to believe that the Republicanism of Abraham Lincoln is superior to that of a more modern type. The party of Lincoln was not organized merely to enfranchise the black race, but to preserve the liberties, the dignity of manhood of every citizen, of whatsoever race or color.

"No Spanish official, from the time of Columbus to that of Weyler, ever saddled them with such monstrous wrongs as our own people are threatened with to-day from the trusts and combines and monopolies upon which most of the great men of the Republican party of this day look with toleration, if not with sympathy. The men who are most notorious as the heads of great monopolies seem to be the most intimate friends of the present Administration, and to be the most eager to redress the wrongs of all people who live outside the United States, it being their well-defined purpose to divert attention from the outrages committed against them.

"So far as the American people are concerned, this Administration seems to look upon them as having no rights except to lay down their lives and, incidentally, their freedom for the conquest of foreign lands and the fattening of domestic monopolies.

"Our leaders, our press, and our legislators have not yet fully realized what this degrading process means to the future of a Republic founded upon democratic principles. A democratic republic can not survive the disappearance of a democratic population.

"When the process of concentration has worked itself out to completion, the law which governs both prices and wages will assert itself with irresistible force. The consumer will be charged the highest price that can be squeezed out of him; the laborer will be paid the lowest wages upon which he can keep life enough in his body to perform his daily task. This result has not yet been quite accomplished, but it is as sure as that night follows day, as certain as the law of human selfishness.

"There is no salvation for the consumer except in free competition; there is no dignity, no manhood for the laborer except in the comparative independence he derives through the free competition of many employers who seek his services. When there shall be but one source from which the consumer can obtain his supplies, but one employer to whom the laborer can offer his services, both consumer and laborer will be slaves.

"There must be remedies. The law was made for the people, not the people for the law. We have done greater things, bolder things, before. Other peoples have accomplished reforms which seemed quite as difficult to the lawyers and the courts. Without going back to the time when parliaments, flinging all law and precedent and supposed property rights to the winds, boldly confiscated the property of the church and of the nobles, when no other method sufficed to restore to the people their natural heritage of the soil, we have a notable example in our own day.

"The soil of Ireland had fallen into the hands of less than 10,000 persons. A population of 5,000,000 rested their feet upon the soil of their ancestors only at the mercy of a few landlords. Rents had so fallen that owners of the fee could not live upon them. Prices of agricultural products were so low by reason of the cheapness of American foods that the tenants could not live and pay the rents, such as they were. Here was a situation more puzzling to the technical jurist than our own. A nation was perishing before the eyes of the world. There was not a court in Great Britain which did not hold that the landlords had a right to fix the rents of their own lands.

"If the tenants could not pay, there was nothing for them to do but get off the soil, even if in doing so they had to get off the earth. What could be clearer than this as a matter of law? Every court in the United States would to-day take the same position as those of Great Britain. Did the British Parliament confess its helplessness? No. It proceeded to create commissions authorized to review the rents of Irish lands and fix them at a figure that would enable the people to live, even if the landlords perished. This would be called confiscation in the United States; and so it was, but it saved a nation's life.

"Shall American legislators hesitate where those of Great Britain went at the disease with a knife? I am aware that the great British Parliament is not limited in its power by a written and rigid constitution, such as that which ties the hands of the National Congress and the State legislatures and makes the courts, in effect, the real lawmakers of this country. But if technical construction of the Constitution stands in our way, the Constitution can be amended, or a more summary method may be adopted by electing and appointing judges who will construe these instruments according to the eternal law of justice and humanity.

"One of the great political parties of this country has already made this latter suggestion in a national platform, only to have it denounced by the promoters of the people's degradation as anarchy and revolution. There may be those who will so denounce me for intimating that there is no divinity hedging about judges which makes them superior to their masters, the sovereign people. I am content to suffer this penalty, if I must, but no penalty shall restrain me from raising my voice on all proper occasions even against courts which foster what I believe to be a danger to the freedom and welfare of the people.

GOVERNMENT OWNERSHIP OF RAILROADS.

"I would hesitate before making any recommendations on the subject of governmental ownership of railroads were I not thoroughly convinced that there is no other equitable and permanent solution of the great questions arising out of railway transportation. This proposition is just in principle, and the experience of all countries where the railroads are operated by the state proves that it is practical.

"If corporations respected the principle that 'each person's liberty ends where the liberty of another person commences,' there would be no need for interference in their affairs by the State. But every citizen knows that the railroads consider neither the rights of their patrons nor the justice of their charges. An unjust charge is an extortion, and when a corporation or an individual becomes so great that it can extort tribute from its patrons without rendering an equivalent in return, it is not only the right but the duty of the State to interfere.

"'Government ownership in Switzerland is public ownership in fact as well as in name, for the people own and control their Government through the initiative and referendum.'

"In my opinion it is high time for Michigan to imitate the example of Switzerland. I most earnestly recommend that this legislature inaugurate a policy looking to the ultimate purchase by the State of all the railroads within its limits. Laws equalizing taxation and regulating rates of fare only reach the symptoms. They do not reach the root of the disease, which is private ownership of public franchises. The only way to permanently cure such evils is to eradicate the cause by the State assuming the ownership and control of all franchises of a public nature."

Mr. Chairman, I have quoted these words of Governor Pingree with especial pleasure, because he is governor of the great State which gave birth to the Republican party—Michigan—in which State it was my privilege to be born and to spend my life, and because I am always glad to recognize the patriotism of those who have the courage of their convictions, whether in accord with their party or otherwise.

THE PATRIARCH FATHER AND THE PRODIGAL SON.

There still lives in that State, in the little city of Ionia, the sole surviving member of the famous "Committee of Sixteen" who drafted the resolutions of the first Republican convention, where "under the classic oaks at Jackson" the party was born and christened "Republican," July 6, 1854.

I refer to Judge Albert Williams, attorney-general of Michigan during the civil war, whom our State delights to honor as one of its most historic personages and distinguished citizens, and whose splendid physical and intellectual powers, although now over 80 years old, still exhibit the vigor of early manhood.

Judge Williams not only announces his convictions that the control of his once beloved party has passed into the hands of those who seek to destroy human freedom, but, believing that his influence should be given in organized work, he has during the past two years openly espoused the Chicago platform and the ticket of the united parties which supported it during the last two campaigns.

It was a scene so impressive as never to be forgotten when this great man, the early friend of Lincoln and his patriot associates, with his kingly bearing, his splendid presence and erect form, his intellectual face, with his eyes flashing fire, told the story of the birth of this once glorious party, the child of his paternal love and solicitude.

To those whose privilege it was to see and hear this great man on these occasions, when the fervor of his soul was reflected with a dramatic power unknown to art, he recalled the words of Shakespeare:

What a piece of work is man! how noble in reason! how infinite in faculties! in form and moving how express and admirable! in action how like an angel! in apprehension how like a god!

He told us how he had assisted at the birth of the party, in one of Nature's most beautiful temples—under the canopy of heaven, where the columns were Nature's giant oaks, "not reared by human hands." He told us how, "With bright hopes for its splendid future, I watched over its cradle, assisted to set it on its feet, whispered words of encouragement, counsel, and hope in its ear as I beheld in this my child such glorious promise for itself and its country!"

He then traced its glorious early history, and the triumphs which our country won for human liberty, and the brilliant pages added to our nation's history under the leadership of that child of promise quickly developed into heroic manhood.

Then this grand old patriarch, trembling with emotion, told us how later on this child of his hopes, after winning renown, was allured by the enemies of its country to forsake its early teachings, and he then said:

I am reminded of an event like this in sacred history, and I recollect how I watched this wayward son as he started, in 1896, for the great convention of St. Louis; how I trembled between hope and fear, wondering whether he would not retrace his dissolute steps and, after building a platform worthy of great name, would return to his father's house with honor "clothed and in his right mind."

But with tears streaming down his face he told us how his dear son, his prodigal son, returned home with swollen eyes, with face of shame, unable to meet his father's glance, and he then said:

Little did I think that this son, born under such glorious auspices, after having won a name so illustrious, should have so far forgotten his splendid youth as to go to St. Louis to take the gold cure! But if my wayward son will forsake his dissolute ways and return to his father's house, how gladly would I kill for him the fatted calf purchased with free silver!

Judge Williams has contributed to Fox's History of Political Parties a most interesting chapter upon the founding of the Republican party, which, both on account of the event and its author, should be read by every student of history. I shall therefore print it as an appendix to my remarks.

Referring to the attitude taken in recent years by the Republican party in the interests of corporate oppression, Judge Williams says in a recent letter to me:

MY DEAR SIR AND FRIEND: The great Republican party, born "under the oaks at Jackson, July 6, 1854, in the sacred interest of humanity and hostility to concentrated, grasping, grinding wealth, and running well and grand for a series of years, how, oh! how has it of late years so lamentably and shamelessly fallen as to become the wet nurse of the money power in all its protean forms." And if this last act (the passage of the anti-scalper's bill), which practically invites and will protect, as to passenger fare, a heartless trust of railways, which will engage in legalized robbery, does not mark the decadence of that party, it will be because the Declaration of Independence has become obsolete and the plain people fit only to be the slaves of trusts.

Mr. Chairman, as I have stated, it is my honor to have been all my life a citizen of the great State (Michigan) which is the birthplace of the Republican party. My father was one of the early pioneers who went from the State of New York to what was then the "Great West," and with his strong right arm cleared away the forest and hewed from the trees his home "near to nature's heart." The principles of the Republican party he had inherited from New England ancestors.

Those principles were inherited by his children, and I well remember how, when a child, I learned to venerate the great Lincoln, and shouted his name in his campaigns as the leader worthy the great cause of human liberty which he represented. And when I became of age my first vote was cast for the Republican ticket. But when I saw that a set of men opposed to the principles of Lincoln had stealthily gained control of that party that they might use its illustrious name to subvert the very liberties which it was founded to protect, I was forced to find another political home, humble though it was, that I might still perform the highest function of an American citizen—that of casting a conscientious ballot.

I desire also to quote the words of Governor Pingree, who, in his famous speech in Buffalo just a year ago, uttered these remarkable words regarding his party:

To the Republican party have come all the trusts and combines, all the beasts of prey and the birds of ill omen, because they feared the Democratic party, which had kicked them out.

FORCIBLE CONQUEST OF A FOREIGN AND INOFFENSIVE PEOPLE IS A MONSTROUS ASSAULT UPON OUR OWN CHARTER OF LIBERTIES AND THE HEROES OF THE REVOLUTION.

I now come to the consideration of the second momentous objection to the quadrupling of our standing Army, as authorized by this bill, the creation of an armed force by which our Republic is to subjugate the people of an infant and struggling republic, whose only crime is to claim those rights which the Declaration of Independence says are inherited by every human being from his Creator.

Mr. Chairman, no sentiment more atrocious has ever been advanced by despots of either ancient or modern times, more repugnant to every conception of those great principles upon which our own Republic was founded. By what right, sir, human or divine, are we to invade the Philippine Islands and shoot down in cold blood those inoffensive people? What have they done? "Why," you say, "they resist the authority of the United States, and refuse to allow us to make their laws and enforce them by American bayonets."

I ask you, sir, whence came this new revelation to us, this new code of morals, which tramples in the dust and spits upon the memory of the heroes of Concord, of Lexington, and of Bunker Hill? If this new gospel of yours that "might makes right" is to henceforth be our inspiration, then the soldiers of Washington whose bleeding bare feet trod the snows of Valley Forge should no more be held in grateful remembrance. If you are correct, then that most glorious of all documents written by human pen, the Declaration of Independence, is a lie, and the heroic deeds and utterances of the patriots of the Revolution, on the field of battle and when framing the charter of our liberties, should be effaced from history.

But, sir, I can not believe that Washington and Jefferson, Franklin and Adams, Madison and Paine, and those countless other patriots who in camp, on the field, or with their voice and pen banished British rule from our shores, were violators of either human or divine law. On the contrary, I believe their deeds and words have rendered their memory immortal and that their influence will extend through all time and to the utmost regions of the earth.

They smote the rock of human traditions, and the tables of the law of the "divine right of kings" engraved for centuries thereon faded away, and there appeared in letters of living light the higher law of the "divine right of man," never to be effaced, to be the possession through all ages of all nations and peoples and tongues.

But you say: "The case is not parallel. We propose to buy the islands and the sovereignty of the people from Spain for $20,000,000. We have already conquered part of the territory, and can give them a better government than they can effect."

Is sovereignty, then, over an inferior or helpless race a thing to be bought and sold? It was once so held in this Republic to its sorrow and disgrace, when 4,000,000 black slaves were driven by the whip of taskmasters, and this barbarous "right" was enforced by the courts and police power; but the conscience of the American people revolted against so great a wrong, and with one stroke of the pen Abraham Lincoln set them free, and thus perished, as we hoped, forever human slavery or vassalage under the Stars and Stripes. [Applause.]

"ALL MEN ARE ENDOWED BY THEIR CREATOR WITH CERTAIN INALIENABLE RIGHTS"—"GOVERNMENTS DERIVE THEIR JUST POWERS FROM THE CONSENT OF THE GOVERNED."

The Declaration of Independence says that "all men are endowed by their Creator with certain inalienable rights, among which are life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness." It does not say that "some men," or "Americans," but "all men" are thus endowed.

That this "new evangel of liberty" was intended as the heritage of all mankind of whatever race, and for all time, I ask your attention to the following high authorities:

Mr. Lincoln, in 1858, in his memorable speech at Lewiston, Me., speaking of the actions and purposes of the founders of our Republic, said:

This was their majestic interpretation of the economy of the universe. This was their lofty and wise and noble understanding of the justice of the Creator to his creatures. Yes, gentlemen, to all his creatures, to the whole great family of man. * * * They grasped not only the whole race of man then living, but they reached forward and seized upon the furthest posterity. They erected a beacon to guide their children and their children's children, and the countless myriads who should inhabit the earth in other ages. Wise statesmen as they were, they knew the tendency of prosperity to breed tyrants, and so they established these great self-evident truths, that when in the distant future some man, some faction, some interest, should set up the doctrine that none but rich men, or none but white men, or none but Anglo-Saxon white men were entitled to life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness, their posterity might look up again to the Declaration of Independence and take courage to renew the battle which their fathers began, so that truth and justice and mercy and all the humane and Christian virtues might not be extinguished from the land; so that no man should thereafter dare to limit and circumscribe the principles on which the temple of liberty was being built. Now, my countrymen, if you have been taught doctrines conflicting * * * with the Declaration of Independence; if you have listened to suggestions which would take away from its grandeur and mutilate the fair symmetry of its proportions, * * * let me entreat you to come back. Return to the fountain whose waters spring close by the blood of the Revolution.

The language of the United States Supreme Court is so decisive on this and upon other phases of the question involved that I desire to quote from their celebrated opinion, as delivered by Mr. Justice Field in Butchers' Union Company vs. Crescent City Company (111 U. S., 746, 756-757):

As in our intercourse with our fellow-men certain principles of morality are assumed to exist, without which society would be impossible, so certain inherent rights lie at the foundation of all action, and upon a recognition of them alone can free institutions be maintained. These inherent rights have never been more happily expressed than in the Declaration of Independence, that new evangel of liberty to the people:

"We hold these truths to be self-evident"—that is, so plain that their truth is recognized upon their mere statement—"that all men are endowed," not by edicts of emperors, or decrees of Parliaments, or acts of Congress, but "by their Creator with certain inalienable rights"—that is, rights which can not be bartered away, or given away, or taken away except in punishment of crime—"and that among these are life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness, and to secure these"—not grant them, but secure them—"governments are instituted among men, deriving their just powers from the consent of the governed."

THE CONSENT OF THE GOVERNED.

Our Declaration of Independence also asserts that "Governments derive their just powers from the consent of the governed." Upon this source of sovereignty Charles Sumner said:

The words that "governments derive their just powers from the consent of the governed" are sacred words, full of life-giving energy. Not simply national independence was here proclaimed, but also the primal rights of all mankind. Then and there appeared the angel of human liberation, speaking and acting at once with heaven-born strength, breaking bolts, unloosing bonds, and opening prison doors; always ranging on its mighty errand, wherever there are any, no matter of what country or race, who struggle for rights denied; now cheering Garibaldi at Naples, as it had cheered Washington in the snows of Valley Forge, and especially visiting all who are downtrodden, whispering that there is none so poor as to be without rights which every man is bound to respect, none so degraded as to be beneath its beneficent reach, none so lofty as to be above its restraining power; while before it despotism and oligarchy fall on their faces, like the image of Dagon, and the people everywhere begin to govern themselves. Such is the popular sovereignty proclaimed by the Declaration of Independence.

He further says:

These words in the Declaration of Independence were not uttered in vain. Do you suppose them idle? Do you suppose them mere phrase or generality? No such thing. They are living words, by which this country is solemnly bound, and from which it can never escape until they are fulfilled. Your statutes can not contain any limitation which inflicts an indignity upon any portion of the human family. Only in this way can you have peace.

I repeat, sir, there is not a single one of the founders of our Republic, or of the Democratic or Republican party, who would defend this monstrous doctrine that the Declaration of Independence is no longer of binding force or that the God-given rights which it enumerates are the heritage of but one nation or race. [Applause.]

FORCIBLE ANNEXATION OF EITHER CUBA OR THE PHILIPPINES WOULD BE VIOLATION OF OUR SACRED PLEDGE WHEN ENTERING INTO THE WAR—AN ANALOGY DRAWN FROM THE REVOLUTION.

In the resolution of Congress formally setting forth the purposes of the United States in the recent war we expressly declared—

The United States hereby disclaims any disposition or intention to exercise sovereignty, jurisdiction, or control over said island except for the pacification thereof, and asserts its determination, when that is accomplished, to leave the government and control of the island to its people.—Joint resolution for the recognition of the independence of Cuba, approved April 20, 1898.

Surely it can not be asserted that this pledge was not made in good faith. Now, under what pretense are the Filipinos deserving of less consideration than the Cubans? They, as well as the Cubans, had reason to believe that we would reasonably assist, much less oppose, "the formation of a free and independent government of their own." And having faith in the integrity of our motives, they both cooperated with our troops in the overthrow of a common foe. When we entered into this war the Philippines had not even been mentioned or thought of as coming under our control in the remotest degree. Many of us had almost forgotten their location, so little intercourse have we had with them.

Only recently, in a book published by the War Department, "Military Notes on the Philippines," it says:

NUMBERS AND AREA.

The number of islands is not definitely known, but is variously estimated at from 1,300 to 2,000. New ones are being continually added to the maps. Some members of the vast archipelago, as well as the more remote districts in the larger islands lying beyond the direct control of the Spanish, have remained unexplored. Even the regions governed by the Europeans are still but imperfectly known, no methodical and detailed study of the Philippines having yet been made. Present maps and charts are extremely defective, except for the seaboard, in the survey of which the leading maritime nations have cooperated.

How comes it, then, that all of a sudden you find we can not longer live happily until we seize this far-away and almost unknown country?

Mr. Chairman, it was my privilege and honor to introduce in this House the first resolution declaring war against Spain and for the recognition of Cuban independence.

It has since been my duty and pleasure to support every honest effort of the Administration to bring the war to a speedy and successful issue and to carry out the sacred pledge contained in the resolution. When the first act looking toward war was before Congress (the appropriation of $50,000,000 for the national defense) to be used at the discretion of the President, which was passed without a dissenting vote, referring to an event in our own history which now seems to demand our increased consideration, I said:

"The time has come when this nation must fulfill its high and God-given mission, for I believe that Almighty God planted our infant Republic on the shores of the western seas to carry forward and upward the standards of civilization and progress and to be the defender of human liberty for the whole Western World.

* * * * * * *

"We should be guided in our action by the most illustrious examples of history. A century and a quarter ago, during the dark days of the Revolution, when our ancestors were nearly exhausted in a conflict with a powerful nation, and the cause of the united colonies hung trembling in the balance, France nobly came to our rescue, and defeat was changed to victory. We have since become a great and powerful nation—great in the intelligence and patriotism of our citizens and great in our strength and resources. What France did for us and the cause of human liberty we should now repay to the struggling Cubans. Had our Government extended them in time its moral support by recognizing a state of war in Cuba, the inhuman butcheries of Weyler and his successors might have long since ceased and our brave seamen of the Maine not have found their grave in a foreign sea."

But the echoes from American firesides, from the Atlantic to the Pacific and from the Gulf to the Lakes, find an answering chord in the breast of every representative of their Government assembled here. Spain will do well to mark our nation in absolute accord, cease at once from her mad course, grant freedom to the Cubans, and seek by penitence and good works to repair as best she can the wrongs done by her to the human race! And may this be the beginning of a new era in which "Peace shall have her victories no less renowned than war!"

Now, suppose that during the Revolution the military power of France had been greater than the combined power of America and England, and after the Revolution was ended, by the cooperation of the soldiers of France with ours, France should have asserted the right to frame our Constitution, claiming we were "less educated, civilized, and refined," and upon our denying her that right, she attempted to enforce it by arms. Would we not have doubted her friendship and the sincerity of her professions? And would we not have repelled her claims by arms, as we had those of Great Britain? If we would have been justified then, the Filipinos are justified now. The cases are parallel.

ATTEMPTED JUSTIFICATION OF FORCIBLE CONQUEST A HOLLOW SHAM—HISTORIC PARALLELS.

But, sir, the plea is urged that "the Filipinos are barbarous, uneducated, and incapable of self-government, and that we can frame for them a better constitution and laws." That they are barbarous and incapable of self-government is contrary to fact. That they are naturally peaceful, and war only against foreign usurpers, is thoroughly established. That they are not all educated according to our standards I admit; but for this lack Spanish tyranny is responsible, and this now being removed, it will give opportunity for their advancement.

It is notorious that this same plea has almost always been urged by covetous nations against those whom they wished to oppress, and was urged against our revolutionary ancestors by those who claimed to be the intellectual as well as moral lights of Great Britain. Dr. Samuel Johnson, one of the most brilliant and scholarly minds which England ever produced, in recognition of whose great attainments as a Christian philosopher the University of Oxford conferred the degree of LL. D., with special ceremonies, said (and perhaps honestly through ignorance of the facts) just previous to the Revolution, that "the Americans were so barbarous and rebellious as to be unworthy the claims of humane consideration or Christian forbearance." He compared our ancestors to "rattlesnakes," and wrote a famous treatise against us, entitled "Taxation no Tyranny," to which he did not, however, have the moral courage to sign his name. From this celebrated work, published in 1775, I quote the following from the first edition:

We are told the Americans can not be taxed; that they are the descendants of men who left all for liberty; that they are too obstinate for persuasion and too powerful for constraint; that the continent of North America contains 3,000,000, not of men, but of Whigs, fierce for liberty and disdainful of dominion, and that they multiply with the fecundity of their own rattlesnakes. * * * Instead of terrifying the English hearer to tame acquiescence, it disposes him to hasten the experiment of bending obstinacy before it becomes more obdurate, and convinces him that it is necessary to attack a nation thus prolific while we may hope yet to prevail.

* * * * * * * *

But hear, ye sons and daughters of liberty, the sounds which the winds are wafting from the Western Continent! The Americans are telling one another that "they are entitled to life, liberty, and property, and that they have never ceded to any sovereign power whatever a right to dispose of either without their consent."

He then speaks of the Continental Congress as a "Congress of anarchy," and says:

All is filled with misrule, uproar, and violence. * * * If they are condemned unheard, it is because there is no need of a trial. * * * That the same vengeance involves the innocent and guilty is an evil to be lamented, but human caution can not prevent it.

He enforces this view on the authority of a bigot of the dark ages, whom he styles a "philosopher."

Referring to that great statesman, Edmund Burke, who in the British Parliament dared to champion the rights of the colonists, unpopular though it was, and to whom America and the world owe a debt of gratitude, and to his colleagues, he says:

On the original contrivers of mischief let an insulted nation pour out its vengeance. With whatever designs they have inflamed this pernicious contest they are equally detestable. To them must be imputed the miseries of war, the sorrow of those that shall be ruined, and the blood of those that shall fall.

It is the custom of those who wish to destroy the liberties of others to raise the cry of "patriotism," and to designate as "traitors" those who have the moral courage to defend the intended victims of lust. This cry has constantly been raised in this Congress by those who seek to plunder the Treasury and legislate in the interests of great corporations, and against those who condemn such legislation and the conquest of the Philippines. Dr. Johnson used this same cowardly invective against those members of the British Parliament who had the patriotism and courage to speak for the rights of the American colonies.

When we reflect that these astounding, and to us inhuman arguments were uttered by one of the foremost men of his nation, reverenced as a Christian teacher as well as a profound scholar and philosopher, and who perhaps honestly thought, as did Paul, that he was "doing God's service," can we not reasonably assume that the "barbarism" of the Filipinos and their inability for self-government has been misstated; that the advocates of forcible conquest may be mistaken, though honest, and that the opponents of this policy are right, as Burke was right?

AMERICAN SYMPATHY WITH THE GREEKS IN THEIR STRUGGLE FOR LIBERTY—WEBSTER'S PATRIOTIC WORK AND WORDS.

It is the just pride of the American people that our nation has always sympathized with the oppressed in other lands, although we could not engage in war in their behalf. During the heroic struggle of the Greeks to throw off the Turkish yoke in 1823, a resolution was introduced in the United States Senate by Daniel Webster for recognizing their independence. Mr. Webster held that the policy, and the rightful policy, of our nation was to progress through the arts of peace, and that a warlike policy, should never be entered upon, except in defense of the oppressed and of the principles of human liberty. He said:

The mighty agents which are working out our greatness are time, industry, and the arts. Our augmentation is by growth, not by acquisition. No schemes can be suggested by us so magnificent as the prospects which a sober contemplation of our own condition, unaided by projects, uninfluenced by ambition, fairly spreads before us. * * * We are placed by our good fortune and the wisdom and valor of our ancestors in a condition in which we can not act an obscure part. Be it for honor, or be it for dishonor, whatever we do is sure to attract the observation of the world.

THE DANGER TO OUR REPUBLIC FROM LUST OF EMPIRE.

The honorable Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] has referred in his able speech to the history of other nations who were overthrown by lust of conquest and domestic foes. He says:

There are two lessons our fathers learned from the history of Greece which they hoped their children would remember—the danger of disunion and domestic strife and an indulgence in the greed and lust of empire. The Greeks stood together against the power of Persia as the American States stood together against the tyranny of England. For us the danger of disunion has happily passed by. Our Athenians and our Spartans are bound and welded together again, each lending to the other the strength of their steel and the sharpness of their tempered blade in an indissoluble union. Our danger today is from the lust of empire. It is a little remarkable that the temptation that besets us now lured and brought to ruin the Athenian people in ancient times. I hope that we may be able to resist and avert that danger as we resisted and averted the peril of disunion.

As to the disposition of nations to tyrannize over their colonial possessions, Professor Creasy says in his Sixteen Decisive Battles of the World:

There has never been a republic yet in history that acquired dominion over another nation that did not rule it selfishly and oppressively. There is no single exception to this rule either in ancient or modern times. Carthage, Rome, Venice, Genoa, Florence, Pisa, Holland, and republican France all tyrannized over every province and subject state where they gained authority.

OUR NATION'S PROSPERITY AND SAFETY IS IN LIBERAL LAWS, AND HER BEST RELIANCE IN WAR IS IN "CITIZEN SOLDIERS."

Mr. Chairman, our nation will advance or decline as other nations have in the past, according as our institutions and laws are just and liberal, and with such laws impartially enforced. With education, industry, and temperance encouraged, no standing army is needed, for we all will be "under the higher law of liberty."

But as we may be drawn into war against our will to protect the integrity of our Republic, it is right and necessary that we be ready at all times for whatever emergencies may arise.

Believing that the nation's defense should be intrusted to citizen soldiers, I favor, instead of increasing our Regular Army, the liberal encouragement of the State militia and National Guard. The man who leaves his home at his country's call has something sacred and dear to inspire him to noble endeavor and heroic deeds. And soon as war is over he returns again to his avocation, helping to build up rather than destroy; a help to the nation rather than a burden. It is with these citizen soldiers, fresh from their homes and firesides, that the great struggles for liberty in the world have been won. Of them, Webster well said:

Shoulder to shoulder they went through the Revolution; hand in hand they stood round the Administration of Washington, and felt his own great arm lean on them for support.

Before closing I wish to recall to your minds the fact that the great nations of Europe are at this moment engaged in preparing a conference looking to a military disarmament. The Czar of Russia, seeing how the world is cursed and impoverished by great standing armies, in inviting a conference of nations for this purpose says:

I look out over the world; I study our civilization, and I do not find it very good. I see nations all engaged in seizing or trying to seize all territory not yet occupied by European powers.

For the native races what does imperial expansion mean? Too often opium, alcohol, and all manner of diseases—a great gulf between the governed and those who rule, and crushing taxation upon the natives for the blessings of this civilization.

And for the nations who seize what does it mean? A continual increase of suspicion, jealousy, and rivalry; the heaping up of fleets and armies in order to take part in a scramble with the world, with the result that the army and navy are swallowing up more and more millions that should be used for the welfare of the people and advancement of the world.

On top are a very few rich and comfortable. Down below, with an ever-increasing pressure of taxes for armaments, is the great mass of poor people, whose position is not very good. There is an ever-increasing multitude of those below, with their breeding discontent ripening into socialism and developing into all kinds of anarchy.

Surely our nation should be the first to encourage, rather than oppose, this humane endeavor, which if effected will bring "peace on earth, good will to men."

Mr. Chairman, the Fifty-fifth Congress is soon to close; a Congress that will pass into history memorable for the statesmanlike legislation it has effected for the banishment of Spanish despotism from both Cuba and the Philippines, accomplished by an Army and Navy whose heroism has added new laurels to American arms. Let us not now dim the luster of their heroism, or dishonor that glorious flag which led them to victory; but let us seize the great opportunities, afforded by those achievements, to win for our nation and its flag the love and reverence of all mankind. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. TODD. Mr. Chairman, I ask for five minutes longer.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman asks that his time be extended five minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. HULL. I object, unless the gentleman talks to the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Iowa object?

Mr. HULL. I object, unless the gentleman talks to the bill.

Mr. TODD. Well, this is right on the bill, Mr. Chairman——

Mr. HULL. I object. The gentleman can extend his remarks in the RECORD.

Mr. FITZGERALD. That objection was made too late. The gentleman had been recognized.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read the second section.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 2. That each regiment of cavalry——

Mr. HENRY of Mississippi. Before leaving section 1, I want to ask the gentleman in charge of the bill if it is his purpose, as he said yesterday, to reduce the number of the Army from 100,000 to 50,000, whether he purposes thereby to make any reduction in the officers as provided for in this bill?

Mr. HULL. Mr. Chairman, I answered that yesterday.

Mr. HENRY of Mississippi. Yes, and I want you to answer it now.

Mr. HULL. And I want to answer it again, so that the House may know that my purpose is not to make any reduction in the line officers, but that there will be a recasting of the staff officers on the new basis.

Mr. HENRY of Mississippi. When will that be?

Mr. HULL. When we reach the proper place.

Mr. HANDY. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words.

Mr. HULL. I raise the point of order that we had commenced reading the second section and the Clerk had not concluded.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Mississippi rose before the Clerk had fairly commenced the reading.

Mr. CANNON. How far shall he proceed before he has commenced reading?

Mr. HANDY. The resolution or amendment offered a moment ago by the gentleman from Michigan brought back to the attention of the House a subject which the gentleman from Illinois

[Mr. CANNON] was speaking about yesterday. I find in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD that the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] said:

I do not believe there is a man in this House, including the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. JOHNSON], who will pledge himself to speak truly, who will say that he would have had the President withdraw the navy or the army from the Philippines up to this time.

Mr. HANDY (from his seat). Oh, yes.

Mr. CANNON. Who is he?

Mr. HANDY (rising). I would have had him. [Manifestations of derision on the Republican side.]

Now, there is no doubt, Mr. Chairman, about the "manifestations of derision;" they were audible and general. I desire now not to explain or modify, but to emphasize the stand which yesterday brought upon me the "manifestations of derision" on the Republican side of the Chamber. I would that Dewey, when he destroyed the Spanish fleet in the harbor of Manila and wiped out of existence the Spanish sea power in the Pacific, had filled his coal bunkers and set to sea with his prows homeward turned. I would to-day that my country would announce concerning the Philippines and the inhabitants thereof what we have announced concerning the Cubans—that they are and of right ought to be free and independent. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

I would, Mr. Chairman, withdraw our army of conquest from those far distant and tropical islands. I would do it soon. I would do it before American troops fire their first shot at men standing bravely, as our forefathers stood, for liberty, independence, and home rule.

Mr. Chairman, I wonder if there is a Bunker Hill near Manila, as there was near our own Boston? We love to remember that our troops at Bunker Hill stood behind the breastworks defending native land against an invading force of foreign tyrants. Shall that memorable, that glorious conflict be reenacted in those tropical islands? Shall our troops be forced to play the part of the invaders, charging up the hill—the tyrants' part—instead of defending home and liberty and independence as our fathers did?

I am bold to say that I would have had our troops withdrawn ere this; I would have had our army of conquest home; I would have had our navy home. For my part, I do not see why we should desire to hold the Philippines. I do not think it took unusual courage to stand up here yesterday and say so, and I do not believe that the "manifestations of derision" from the Republican side of the Chamber represent in the least the public sentiment of this country. The public sentiment of this country is in line with the amendment offered by the gentleman from Michigan, which was ruled out on a point of order. The public sentiment of this country is rising in favor of recognition of human rights all over the world, in favor of recognizing and granting the liberty that the Filipinos stand up and ask for, as well as the liberty that the Cubans have struggled so long to attain. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, just one word. The gentleman has read from the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD correctly what happened yesterday. The gentleman from Delaware constitutes one, the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. TODD] constitutes the other. That is a pair; and so far as any manifestation was had yesterday, I believe, for one, you might draw to every member of this House and you could not get three of a kind. [Great laughter.]

Mr. HANDY. Mr. Chairman, when the gentleman from Illinois——

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Chairman, I rise to a question of order.

Mr. HANDY (continuing). Was on the floor——

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio rises to a question of order.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Chairman, I deny the right of a member of this House to speak in a language that is not understood by the average American. [Great laughter.]

Mr. CANNON. The gentleman from Ohio is just about an average American. [Renewed laughter].

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks the point of order comes too late. [Laughter.]

Mr. HANDY. Mr. Chairman, I wish to say that when the gentleman from Illinois was standing on the floor, not being a pair at all, but simply a single card—that when he stood there and drew for additional cards over on this side of the House, and succeeded in getting the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. TODD] and myself to stand up, there were three of a kind before the House [cries of "Oh, no!" on the Republican side], and it would take exactly three queens to beat us. [Great laughter.]

Mr. TODD. The gentleman from Illinois alludes to me. I am reminded that Henry Clay once said——

Mr. BELL. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Michigan will suspend. The gentleman from Colorado is recognized.

Mr. TODD. Mr. Chairman, I desire to reply to a personal allusion made to me.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Michigan is not in order.

Mr. TODD. I desire to reply to a personal allusion made to me. Will the gentleman give me just one minute to reply to a personal allusion?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Colorado yield?

Mr. BELL. What I have to put in I would rather——

Mr. TODD. I just want to answer a personal allusion made to myself. [After a pause.] All right. I am always glad to hear my distinguished friend from Colorado.

Mr. BELL. I will yield to the gentleman.

Mr. TODD. Mr. Chairman, I am reminded, by the satire which the distinguished gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] attempts to heap upon two members of this House who have the courage to stand for their convictions, of the reply that Henry Clay once made, that he would rather be right than be President. But the distinguished gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] has changed that to "I would rather be wrong than be President."

Mr. BELL. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. Mr. Chairman, I rise to a point of order. What amendment is pending?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state that the amendment is to strike out the last two words.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. I make the point of order that that is not a germane amendment to the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Colorado is recognized.

Mr. BELL. Mr. Chairman, I take it that if we did not intend to hold the Philippine Islands this bill would not be here. I have received from the city of Denver, from the Cigar Makers' Union, a petition that is applicable to the question involved. The annexation of these islands will not only bring the tobacco grown by the cheap Malay labor of these islands in direct competition with the tobacco growers of this country, but it will put the tobacco and cigar manufacturers in direct competition with these cheap laborers.

I desire this petition read as a part of my remarks.

The Clerk read as follows:

Whereas there is grave danger that the late war with Spain, declared for the purpose of freeing a subjected race from alien tyranny, may degenerate into a war of conquest;

Whereas it is our joint duty as citizens, when questions of great moment arise, to express our sentiments clearly and unequivocally: Therefore, be it

Resolved, That the Cigar Makers' Union No. 129, of Denver, Colo., does hereby earnestly protest against the United States acquiring, annexing, or claiming sovereignty over the Philippine Islands, for the following reasons:

First. It would be in open and direct conflict with the Declaration of Independence and the fundamental principles of a republic to hold by conquest any country against the will of its people. It would necessitate the creation of a great army, not an army of defense, the only kind a republic should own, but an army of repression and coercion.

Second. As workingmen, and more especially as cigar makers, we protest against the admission to our ranks of a horde of semicivilized races whose highest wants can be supplied upon from 5 cents to 15 cents per day. Against such competition there can be no defense: Therefore, be it

Resolved, That a copy of these resolutions be forwarded the Senators and Congressmen of our State.

Yours, fraternally,

CHAS. DUNN,
122 East Bayaud street.

Hon. JOHN C. BELL,
House of Representatives.

Mr. BELL. Now, Mr. Chairman, I also have here an interview with a soldier just discharged and returned from the Philippine Islands that I desire to have the Clerk read, which also throws light on this bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Ferdinand Reinhardt, of Denver, a member of Company B, First Colorado Volunteers, arrived in Denver yesterday, heartily thankful to be home and very tired of doing garrison duty at Manila. After having fever and enduring many hardships, heart trouble rendered him unfit for duty, and, securing a discharge, he sailed home on the Ohio.

"Up until last October the rations we received were very poor and inadequate in quantity and quality," said he. "Finally the murmurings in the ranks and the cablegram sent to Governor Adams telling him that 1,000 enlisted men of the regiment wanted to come home had their effect and the food improved. It is an actual fact, however, that before the improvement was noted we were fed canned horse meat. It was supposed to be beef, but nevertheless it was common, ordinary horse, and every once in a while we would get a piece of hide with hair on it that told the true origin of the meat.

"The bread was bad, too, and at times wormy. We often found baked worms in it. They had evidently taken possession of the flour, and the Chinese cooks who made the bread did not care.

"There was a good deal of feeling when that cablegram from the men telling Governor Adams they wanted to come home was sent. It cost about $200 to have it cabled. Colonel McCoy went to the committee of men who had the matter in charge and asked them not to send the message by wire, but to write it. The men persisted, but when they went to the cable office the message was refused on the ground that Colonel McCoy's permission to send it had not been received. In the afternoon Colonel McCoy agreed that the message should go, but then the lack of the approval of General Otis was given by the cable people as an excuse for not accepting the message. The boys were not to be beaten, however, and gave the cablegram to a Red Cross man, intrusted the money to him, and at Hongkong the message was accepted and sent.

"When I left Manila there was a great deal of sickness in the regiment; for instance, there must have been 30 officers and men unfit for duty in Company B alone. After a man gets sick there he does not get over it, but kind of mopes along and remains weak and listless. I fear there will be a great many men ill within a short time, for the most unhealthy season of the year is now on. Not more than 1 per cent of the soldiers on the island are willing to remain there. The 1 per cent is composed of those who believe they can make money in the Philippines."—Denver Post, January —, 1899.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Colorado has expired.

Mr. HULL. Mr. Chairman, I object to the further extension of time, because this can all be printed in the RECORD.

Mr. BELL. Does the gentleman expect to extend this to all members of the House?

Mr. HULL. I want the bill considered, and I think the purpose of the gentleman is to delay the consideration of the bill.

Mr. BELL. Then I give the gentleman warning now that he may expect to be paid in his own coin should he want an extension of time.

Mr. HULL. Well, Mr. Chairman, I am requested by a colleague on the committee to withdraw, and I will withdraw my objection for the next five minutes, but I now give notice to members that I want this bill considered.

Mr. BELL. Well, this letter is exactly applicable to this bill.

The Clerk proceeded with the reading of the paper:

"I do not think there will be any serious trouble at Manila. If there is, the Filipinos are the least likely to start it. They are tired of war and taxation, are not a military people, and fight like amateurs. In the trenches they simply stick their rifles out and shoot at random. I think the troops now at Manila will be able to attend to any outbreak that may occur there, and I regard trouble there as unlikely.

"Iloilo is a different proposition. It is 600 miles distant, and has in its population many Mohammedans who will fight fiercely against conquest by a Christian nation. There may be serious trouble at Iloilo, but when I left Manila there was little excitement or alarm concerning it.

"To explain the whole situation briefly, I say that troops in the Philippines will now suffer greatly from the climate. Trouble at Manila is unlikely, and the outcome at Iloilo is a guess. One Spanish regiment that went to Iloilo lost 80 per cent of its men from disease or wounds."

Mr. BELL. Now, Mr. Chairman, as I said, this is directly applicable to our condition here. This shows beyond question that one company from which this discharged soldier came has about 33 per cent unfit for service now. It shows also that of the Spanish companies that were sent to Iloilo only 20 per cent returned alive. Now, the application of it comes here. The cost of the Army that we are now organizing must include the resulting pension roll. The pension roll of the Army of the rebellion makes the expense of the war much more than that for the actual soldiers in the time of conflict. I say that the diseases and deaths of the soldiers who go to these islands will so swell the pension roll that the $82,000,000 or $100,000,000 per annum will be a mere pittance of the cost of acquiring this territory before we are through with it.

Furthermore, there has been quite a dispute about the actual current expense. Now, I have before me, as gathered by the San Francisco Call, the estimated expenses of this Army under this bill made by the officers of the Government, as follows:

Letters sent by Adjutant-General Corbin to Chairman HULL, of the House Military Committee, give the present cost of the Regular Army at $24,443,480; cost under the proposed bill, $82,053,885; increase of cost, $57,710,231.

The cost as applied to the three main departments of the Army is as follows:

Quartermaster's Department, present cost, $7,107,000; proposed, $40,013,246. Subsistence Department, present cost, $2,730,775; proposed cost, $10,148,478. Pay Department, present cost, $14,496,659; proposed cost, $31,891,943.

General Corbin incloses letters from Quartermaster-General Ludington, Commissary-General Eagan, and Paymaster-General Stanton, showing the details of the comparison. The main items of increase in the Quartermaster's Department are:

Transportation, from $2,300,000 to $17,700,000; clothing and equipment, from $975,000 to $5,952,246; regular supplies, from $1,800,000 to $7,200,000; barracks, quarters, and military posts, from $1,170,000 to $4,000,000; hospitals, $90,000 to $360,000; incidental expenditures, $600,000 to $2,400,000.

General Eagan gives the increased cost of each branch of the service, including active, sick, and convalescent.

General Stanton says the pay estimate does not cover the 20 per cent to enlisted men during time of war or the proposed 25 per cent to those serving in distant lands.

But the great pension roll that is to come from our soldiers serving at Manila, I say, will swell it more than you have any idea of at this time.

I was talking with an officer who has just returned from Manila, and he says that a man begins to degenerate the moment he arrives there. He says a man will suffer more with heat on Pennsylvania avenue at times than he will in Manila; but that when the heat begins in Manila it goes from the end of one year to another, day and night, and that he could not work up even courage enough to read a magazine; that in what they call the "dry season" there it is raining most all the time.

He said that the population were as much inferior to the population of Hawaii as the Hawaiians are inferior to the Americans; that they were undergrown, that they were diseased, that they had the vilest of loathsome diseases pictured on their faces; their teeth were yellow, their mouths sore, they were dwarfed and inferior in every way, and the unfortunate thing of the whole occurrence was that Mr. Dewey did not find the fleet in mid-ocean and sink it there and return to Hongkong. He said they delighted to dine on monkeys, mice, snails, and stewed grasshoppers, and there was no possibility of their ever assimilating with our population. Now, if we do not want these inhabitants as American citizens, then we do not want or need the passage of this bill. He says our people can not stand the rigor of the climate, and even if their health would permit they would not remain there.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Chairman, I do not criticise the letter of the soldier. I will assume, for the purposes of what I am going to say, that every word of it is true and contains no exaggeration. Therefore, I would ask the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. BELL] if he is willing to precipitate a condition that will reduce the Regular Army to 20,000 or 25,000 men and compel the retention of these volunteers during their entire two years of service. One of the very purposes of this bill, which is being fought at every step of the way, is to put into the hands of the War Department such material of war as will enable the Department to muster out of the service every one of the volunteers and let them come home.

The opposition to the ratification of the treaty, if it should be successful, would impose upon the War Department the duty of compelling the volunteers to remain in service until an extra session of the Senate, that can be extended during the entire summer, if necessary, shall have ratified that treaty; for the right of the volunteer to come home and the Regular Army soldier to come home will only accrue when the treaty is ratified. So that every delay here, every effort at delay, not only arouses the hopes of certain portions of the inhabitants of those islands, but it puts this terrible burden upon these volunteer soldiers, who ought to have the privilege of coming home.

Mr. LOUD. Mr. Chairman, I regret very much that it seems to some gentlemen on our side necessary to endeavor to appeal to fear and passion in order to pass this bill. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR], appealing to a sentiment now existing for the return of our volunteers, undertakes to urge that as a reason for the passage of this bill. I regret also that there has been crimination and recrimination in this House in regard to the motives of the Chief Executive of this nation. The Chief Executive, just the same as members of this House and the country, is in a chaotic state in regard to this question. He can not tell what to-morrow will bring forth.

I believe that if we had followed the inclination or suggestion of the President; I believe that if we had not been tempted by gentlemen on the other side, who should now be repenting in "sackcloth and ashes" and who here to-day are bitterly opposing this bill, and further induced or frightened by the gentleman from Missouri, who said in his celebrated speech, "We had to take you Republicans by the scuff of the neck and drag you into this war" (I do not know whether that language was changed when it went into the RECORD, but that is what he said), we would have been free from sin and out of trouble. I believe that if the country had followed the President we never would have had any war.

I thank God daily that I had no responsibility in bringing on this war. I am not a prophet and could not see all the evil results, but I saw enough to dread war. I knew that "war was hell," and its consequences disastrous to the nation. But you forced war upon the country, and we must accept the consequences, not in passion, but in calmness, with deliberation; and you can not hold the President responsible. He has hold of a live wire and can not let go now, but time and his wisdom will release him and us.

As I have said, the President stands to-day not knowing what to-morrow may bring forth. I do not believe there is a man in this country who can undertake to predict whether we are to retain Cuba or not. In a high-sounding resolution we declared that we would not; that we were only going to free the people of Cuba; but I repeat, what to-morrow may bring forth no man can tell. Such being the condition, is it not better to await results before forcing upon the country a large standing army?

Now, then, the Committee on Military Affairs have brought into this House a bill (although I believe they have since proposed to surrender by subterfuge one-half of it) to increase our Army to 100,000. Now, is that necessary? If you raise the Regular Army to 100,000 men you can not get rid of it. You may perhaps get rid of some of the privates, but you can not get rid of the officers; you can not get rid of putting them on the retired list; you can not get rid of pensioning their widows after they shall have passed away.

Let us then go slowly. Let us await the development of events. Let us increase our Army to 50,000—not in the manner that gentlemen here propose. Let me say to you, when you retreat, as you have retreated, retreat manfully. Do not endeavor to flank us by coming here with this subterfuge—an amendment proposing to fix the minimum of the Regular Army. Why, gentlemen, you can not catch suckers with so much of the hook exposed as that. [Laughter.] Why, sir, such a proposition is an overturning of our whole system of legislation. You might as well say to the military department, "You shall spend so much money, and as much more as you please." You might as well frame your appropriation bills upon that basis.

No, sir; Congress should retain within itself the right and the power to fix the maximum. Let us fix the number of this Regular Army at 50,000, which I think the demands of this country justify—I am speaking now of the United States—and let it be determined by subsequent events whether we are going to retain those islands by force or not. If we are to retain them without force, many of our troops will not be required, either in Cuba or in the Philippine Islands.

Mr. CANNON. Suppose that within the next six months it should be necessary for the defense of person and property and the honor of the Republic to have more men in the Army than 50,000?

Mr. LOUD. I say, give the President the power to enlist for one or two years, when necessary, volunteers; but do not fix upon this country a regular army. [Applause.] Oh, Mr. Chairman, they have been compelled to bring into this debate as a "buffer" my friend from Illinois. This gentleman, who has heretofore stood up in defense of conservative appropriations, appears to be turning a complete somersault; but, no, he is only turning his face the other way; it is only temporary——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from California has expired.

Mr. HULL and Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana asked unanimous consent that Mr. LOUD's time be extended.

There was no objection.

Mr. LOUD. The gentleman from Illinois has for many years stood here, and very properly, as the guardian of the public Treasury, and I honor him for it. But he says, "What is $50,000,000 when the honor and the integrity of the country are at stake?" Sir, $50,000,000 is as nothing when the expenditure is necessary; but, Mr. Chairman, it is not necessary to put upon this country a regular army to protect the honor and integrity of the country.

"Oh," they say, "do not talk about expense." Sir, our pension roll of $150,000,000 to-day is not going to decrease. You are going to increase it. One hundred and fifty million dollars for the support of the Army! Three hundred million dollars for a military establishment! And you know it is a fact that a growing pension roll must come as the result of your proposition.

Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana. And you have a deficit now in sight for the last two years and for the coming year of about $180,000,000 to be provided for.

Mr. LOUD. Unquestionably; and your present system of taxation, devised to meet existing conditions, is practically inoperative in this regard, and there is no man on the floor who can say that it will be sufficient to meet the expenditures of the proposed army. [Applause.]

Now, Mr. Chairman, we have a duty to perform in this matter. There is no necessity for this unseemly haste. Let us go slowly. You can not re-form this bill, let me say to the gentleman, on the floor of the House to meet an army of 50,000 men on the framework of the original bill. You can not re-form in the face of the enemy. If you endeavor to re-form the bill on the basis of 50,000 or 60,000 men as a minimum in the Army, you will have a bill that is not appropriate to meet the scrutiny of anybody. [Applause.]

You have proposed to debate this bill until next Tuesday. The vote is to be taken at a certain hour on that day. You have listened already to some of the rumblings on this side of the Chamber, and have offered a concession—an apparent concession—to those gentlemen who are opposed to some of the features of the bill, which is not in any sense of the word a concession.

The idea of a legislative body fixing the minimum of the standing army in this manner is simply an absurdity. How will you meet the difficulty? Let me, with your permission, offer a single suggestion. You are patriotic men; you are desirous of doing the best; your chairman is able and capable. You take the bill back into your committee again and bring it before the House prepared and properly completed in every function and in every provision, and you can pass it just as easily by Tuesday as not. [Applause on the Democratic side.] That is to say, if you prepare it to meet the requirements of an army of fifty or even sixty thousand men if necessary. But I beg you, gentlemen, do not endeavor to press, by subterfuge, the Army bill providing for 100,000 men upon this House, because you can not catch a vote with any such bait as that. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. HULL. Mr. Chairman, a single word in response to the gentleman.

The gentleman from California says that there has never been a law, and that there never can be any law, by which the maximum and minimum of the military establishment is to be fixed.

Mr. LOUD. I said that there could be no minimum fixed.

Mr. HULL. If the gentleman had read the law in force before the late war with Spain, and if he had listened to or read the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MARSH], he would have found that it was almost a copy of the military law of this country as it stood in force for many years. We provided in 1870, I think it was, that the companies of infantry should be composed of 60 enlisted men as a minimum——

Mr. LOUD. I hope the gentleman will not undertake to misconstrue what I did say.

Mr. HULL (continuing). To be expanded, in the discretion of the President, if occasion should arise, to 100 enlisted men.

Congress afterwards passed another act, independently of this law, putting the maximum at 30,000 in the Regular Army, and afterwards, on an appropriation bill, fixing the number at 25,000 enlisted men——

Mr. LOUD. One being a peace and the other a war footing.

Mr. HULL (continuing). The maximum and minimum of companies standing unchallenged all this time, and when the Army was reduced the last time the officers were not interfered with.

Mr. LOUD. I ask the gentleman if one condition did not apply to war and the other to peace?

Mr. SHAFROTH. What is the condition of the amendment proposed? Is this your amendment?

Mr. HULL. The gentleman from California also said, in the course of his remarks, that the Committee on Military Affairs had surrendered the whole question. I say that we have not surrendered one single thing. We simply propose to fix a minimum and leave some power in the discretion of the Executive, and it was proposed before my distinguished friend from Iowa [Mr. HENDERSON] made his speech the other day. We are told this morning by the press of the country that General HENDERSON "frightened the committee" into surrendering! But the committee proposed to fix the minimum of the Army before we heard from him, and the gentleman from Illinois, my colleague on the committee [Mr. MARSH], gave notice that he would offer that amendment before any such remarks were made by anybody upon the floor. We may have been surprised at his argument, but certainly have not been frightened by his opposition.

The proposition was discussed by several members on the floor informally with members of the Military Committee, and we were perfectly willing to fix a minimum. It is not a very unusual thing. For more than a quarter of a century we lived under that kind of a military law. Again, they say we can not revise the Army on the lines that we suggest. Why? On account of the line officers? Did the Congress of the United States cut off a single line officer when it reduced the Army from 30,000 to 25,000? Did they cut off a single officer? Two companies of each regiment of infantry were skeletonized, but the officers were kept.

Mr. LOUD. Why, no; but you should have done it, and from the Navy, too.

Mr. HULL. You should not have done so. When the number of regiments were reduced Congress legislated officers out, but when the number in a company were reduced the line officers were left. Why? Because you have here the nucleus of an army. You have your 60 men in a company, you have your officers detailed in time of peace as professors in colleges, you have them detailed as teachers at West Point, you have them as recruiting officers, you have them in all the various details of the Government, running up to about 337 officers. And then if you have war, you are not subjected to the expense of bringing in men without training, men without experience, men without knowledge, to take command of troops in the face of the enemy. You have these trained men prepared for immediate and efficient service. The Government needs them. It is not unusual to propose it.

I am in favor of an army that the President can have at his disposal, if necessary, of a hundred thousand men, and I want to say to you and to this House that if this bill is recommitted it has got to be on the motion of some one other than myself and by a yea-and-nay vote of the members of this House who are willing to go on record. [Applause on the Republican side.] We might just as well understand this now as at any time. My friend from California [Mr. LOUD] has the right to oppose the Army. He has the right to oppose an increase of the number which is necessary to enforce the laws of the United States. He has the right as a member to say to the President that he will not trust him with this discretion, but neither he nor any other member of this House has the right to assume to this House that they are the majority of the House and try to scare and browbeat and force the Military Committee into a course of action that not a single member of the majority of the committee believes right. [Applause on the Republican side.]

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from California saw proper to refer to myself in connection with this proposed legislation, and talked in general terms about a great increase of pensions, and, instead of giving discretionary power to increase the Regular Army from fifty to a hundred thousand, in the discretion of the President, says let us have one-year volunteers. Is there any discretion to the President there?

Mr. LOUD. He can get rid of them when we get through.

Mr. CANNON. Has it not been said here time and again that our people do not wish to volunteer for garrison duty? Have we not now from seventy-five thousand to a hundred thousand volunteers who are kept in the Army and will be kept in the Army until some provision is made for an increase of the Regular Army, and who are clamoring to come home?

But the gentleman is afraid of pensions. There is not much danger of considerable pensions to a small regular army of 50,000 to 100,000 men who are disciplined and inured and acclimatized—not much. The great bulk of the pension roll growing out of the war with Spain is to come from our 250,000 volunteers.

Mr. HAY. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. CANNON. I have but two or three minutes.

Mr. LOUD. The volunteers outnumbered the others ten to one, and the bulk of the pensions ought to come from them.

Mr. CANNON. Now, I want to say a word to the gentleman from California, who says that I have faced about the other way.

Mr. LOUD. Temporarily.

Mr. CANNON. I stand ready now, as I have always stood, ready to help give every dollar from the Federal Treasury that an efficient public service demands [applause on the Republican side], and I hope I will die politically and otherwise when I ever preach any other doctrine. My good friend from California is scared upon this economical question, or he is not as frank as he usually is in this House, and is seeking under the cry of economy to prevent the House from giving the proper armed force for the national defense and the national honor. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana. National defense against whom?

Mr. CANNON. And I for one will not take counsel of the gentleman from Indiana or the gentleman from California in shaping my vote for an increase of the Regular Army, because they are not friendly Indians. [Applause and laughter on the Republican side.]

Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana. I would have liked the gentleman to state against whom we need preparation for a national defense.

Mr. WALKER of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, we are entering upon very serious legislation, and we ought to do it in all coolness. We ought to keep in mind the conditions of the country and the seriousness of the business we are doing. I listened to the speech of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. JOHNSON] the other day, and, striking out a very little that was entirely foreign to the subject and very unnecessary, I could approve the speech.

I also listened to the speech of the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. DOLLIVER] in reply, and I could see very little in it, if anything, I did not approve of. It was entirely consistent, most of it, with the bulk of the speech of the gentleman from Indiana, but why need we have any of this heat and passion? There is no cause for any adverse criticism of the President. There is not a particle of evidence before the country from first to last, in interviews, in words spoken, in messages, state papers of any kind, that the President of the United States is not as much opposed to forcibly taking a single foot of foreign territory in permanency as the gentleman from California [Mr. LOUD] or the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. JOHNSON].

A word about "subsequent events," of which the gentleman from California speaks. In any true sense of his allusion to them as creating an exigency they are upon us now. They are here. I would vote to-day to pay $100,000,000 for the privilege of honorably forsaking at once Porto Rico, Cuba, and the Philippines. But I would sacrifice $500,000,000 before I would dishonorably do either. [Applause.] Dishonorably do either! There is not a man in this House that would so do. We now have those islands. There is no possible path out of our dilemma but to confirm the treaty and to take the islands, and that at once. Take all of them into our possessions. If we can not trust ourselves to do right, who can we trust?

Mr. GAINES. And hold them permanently?

Mr. WALKER of Massachusetts. Not by any means. Not necessarily so, at all. And then depart from every one of them, so far as forcing a government upon them, at the very earliest opportunity we can honorably do it.

Mr. GAINES. Why does not the President say that?

Mr. WALKER of Massachusetts. Wait a moment. Because the President can not safely say it now. It is for us to say it when we have confirmed the treaty and have a right to say it. Not the President now or hereafter.

Mr. GAINES. Ought he not say it?

Mr. WALKER of Massachusetts. He ought not to say it now. When we have rescued a boy from the hands of a bully we want the bully to first submit, to give us possession of the boy, before we can treat with him or with the boy, or make the boy safe.

Mr. GAINES. This is not a boy. Here are 10,000,000 people, whom Dewey says are capable of self-government.

The CHAIRMAN. The committee will be in order.

Mr. WALKER of Massachusetts. Not so. They are less than a boy. I would like to have two minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman's time has not yet expired.

Mr. TODD. I would like to ask the gentleman if he would be willing that those troops should be withdrawn when they have formed an independent republic of their own?

Mr. WALKER of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, let me say to you that we propose to submit all questions for the consent of the governed, in the Philippines and everywhere else. The important question is, What is "the consent of the governed?" The governed must be competent to give an intelligent consent. They must be intelligent enough to give a rational consent. There can be no such thing as "consent of the governed" of an individual or of a people that has not sufficient intelligence, culture, and civilization to give a legal "consent." There is not a man on this side of the House or in this country—and I do not strike off the other side of the House—that does not claim as much interest in having "all governments derive their just powers from the consent of the governed" in these islands as you do.

Now, as to the Army, every fact and every consideration presented to this House shows that this Army bill should pass exactly as it is now proposed to pass it. It is in the interest of an efficient Army, in the interest of economy. There is not a man on this floor who believes that we can get an intelligent "consent of the governed" from the people in Cuba, or Porto Rico, or in the Philippines, even in three years. Then why not pass this bill and make such an Army as we ought to have under existing conditions, and trust to a subsequent Congress to change it whenever they think it wise to change it? Rest assured the most unhappy thing that a conservative President can do is to have a single man more in the Army than is absolutely necessary.

There is not a man in this country in public office or private place, be he a Democratic President or be he a Republican President, that will have any more interest in reducing the Army to the lowest possible point than the man who stands in the White House now and every other President and for evermore.

The only sound army legislation for a free people is a flexible system, with a minimum and maximum force, with the same number of officers to the minimum force. This is necessary that there may be enough officers to distribute a large number among the States to educate a large force of citizen soldiers, that they may be ready for action in an emergency.

Mr. HULL. Mr. Chairman, I move that all debate be closed on this section. There is no amendment pending. There is no trouble in gentlemen getting in on the next section.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa moves that all debate on this section be closed.

The question was taken; and the motion was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 2. That each regiment of cavalry shall consist of 1 colonel; 1 lieutenant-colonel; 3 majors; 15 captains, 3 of whom shall be available for detail as adjutant, quartermaster, and commissary; 15 first lieutenants, 3 of whom shall be available for detail as squadron adjutants; 12 second lieutenants; 2 veterinarians; 1 sergeant-major; 1 quartermaster-sergeant; 1 commissary-sergeant, who shall have the rank, pay, and allowances of a quartermaster-sergeant of cavalry; 3 squadron sergeant-majors, who shall have the pay and allowances of first sergeants of cavalry; 1 band, and 12 troops organized into 3 squadrons of 4 troops each: Provided, That nothing herein contained shall be construed as abolishing the office of chaplain in each regiment of colored cavalry. Each cavalry band shall consist of 1 chief musician; 1 chief trumpeter; 1 principal musician; 1 drum major, who shall have the rank, pay, and allowances of a first sergeant of infantry; 4 sergeants; 8 corporals; 1 cook, and 11 privates. Each troop of cavalry shall consist of 1 captain; 1 first lieutenant; 1 second lieutenant; 1 first sergeant; 1 quartermaster-sergeant; 6 sergeants; 8 corporals; 2 cooks; 2 farriers and blacksmiths; 1 saddler; 1 wagoner; 2 trumpeters, and 83 privates, the commissioned officers to be assigned from among those hereinbefore authorized. The veterinarians provided for in this section shall be enlisted and shall have the pay of $1,200 per annum: Provided, That the veterinary surgeons now in service with cavalry regiments may be enlisted as veterinarians without reference to age: And provided further, That in computing length of service for retirement such veterinarians shall be credited with the time they have already served as veterinary surgeons.

The amendment recommended by the committee was read, as follows:

Line 5, after the word "shall," strike out down to and including the word "annum," in line 7, and insert "have the rank, pay, and allowances of a second lieutenant of cavalry."

Mr. HAY. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer an amendment to the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Virginia desires to offer an amendment to the amendment.

Mr. COX. I desire to move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Virginia offers the following amendment to the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

In line 8, after the word "cavalry," insert the words "provided that the veterinary provided for above shall stand a competitive examination, to be held under rules and regulations to be prescribed by the Surgeon-General of the United States."

Mr. COX. Now, then, Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment. The gentleman from Tennessee to the right of the Chair is recognized.

Mr. HULL. This is simply a regulation of the War Department.

Mr. CANNON. To what amendment does that go?

Mr. HULL. This goes to the amendment for a veterinary surgeon.

Mr. HAY. I would like to be heard on this subject.

Mr. HULL. The gentleman has the floor.

Mr. COX. I am recognized, I think, by the Chair. [Laughter.]

Mr. HULL. I have nothing to say against the amendment. It is simply a matter of regulation by the War Department. I do not think that there can be any objection to it, and I have no objection to having it written in the bill.

Mr. HAY. Then you have no objection to my amendment?

Mr. HULL. Not at all; it is simply what the Department would do, I think.

Mr. CARMACK. Mr. Chairman, I wish to recur briefly to some remarks that have been made in the progress of this debate. It has been assumed by gentlemen on this side of the Chamber, and believed, I think, by the country at large, that this bill to quadruple the permanent military force of the country is simply part of a scheme of colonial empire. That such a policy has been determined upon by the present Administration and by the Republican party has been believed without doubt or question by all the people of every political party in the country. For the first time, within the last few days, we have heard a suggestion of doubt upon that question. It was believed when the President of the United States on his Southern tour asked the question as to who should haul down the flag in the Philippine Islands that that was simply an interrogative and rhetorical form of declaring that that flag should never be hauled down.

My friend from Iowa [Mr. HEPBURN] the other day sought to put a different construction on that language; but able and eloquent as that gentleman is, I wish to say that when it comes to translating the mind of the President of the United States into the language of the country, I prefer the more authoritative interpretation of my friend from Ohio. [Laughter.] Upon this question of pulling down the flag, I wish to quote my distinguished friend from Ohio and his expression of the sentiments of the President of the United States and the policy of the Administration.

Now, I do not wish to say that my friend from Ohio is the mouthpiece of the President, because he is not, but I do say that whenever he undertakes to speak, and positively proclaims that he is speaking for the Administration, what he says is ex cathedra, and it comes hot from the throne. [Laughter.]

Here the other day—on the 12th of January, to be exact—my friend from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR], in reply to some remarks of mine, in which I commented upon the fact that the Republican conventions in the last campaign had not indorsed the policy of permanently holding the Philippine Islands, quoted the language used by him in addressing the Ohio convention, which was as follows:

> I make no prognostication except this: I doubt very much whether you or I will live to see the day when by the order of a Republican Administration—and surely not by the order of McKinley's Administration—the starry banner of your country's glory shall be pulled down from any flagstaff where conquest of arms has placed it.

The gentleman read that to the House, and he declared, "I had the honor to deliver that sentiment, and I have never backed down from it."

Now, Mr. Chairman, conquest of arms, the President in his proclamation to the people of the Philippine Islands declares, has placed our flag over those islands, and my friend from Ohio, speaking, as he expressly avowed, for the Administration, and speaking what he declared to be the views and policy of the Administration, declared that that flag should never come down; that none of us now living would ever live to see the flag taken down from the flagstaff where the conquest of arms had placed it in the Philippine Islands; and the gentleman on the 12th day of this month declared that he still adhered to it and that such was the policy of the Administration.

Mr. GROSVENOR. The gentleman is mistaken; I did not say it was the policy of the Administration. The gentleman said I repeated it and said I never had backed down from it and that it was the policy of the Administration.

Mr. CARMACK. I did not intend to say that the gentleman said that; I was interpreting his language, not undertaking to quote his exact words; but he did say in that passage which he quoted and indorsed that the flag would not be pulled down by order of McKinley's Administration from any flagstaff where conquest of arms has placed it.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. RICHARDSON. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman's time be extended five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. CARMACK. Now, my friend from Iowa [Mr. HEPBURN] said the other day that he did not doubt we should deal with the Philippine Islands just as we have promised to do with the island of Cuba; that we will give liberty and independence and the right of self-government to its people.

Now, I wish to say if that will come from some authoritative source, if that promise shall be made with the sanction of this Government, then I believe that the crisis now on in the Philippine Islands and the hour of danger will have passed. But if there is to be war there, if there is to be slaughter there, if the Philippine Islands are to be made to swim in the blood of their inhabitants and in the blood of the American soldier, the responsibility, I will say to my friend from Ohio, will rest upon those who, by saying with authority what the gentleman from Iowa has said upon his own responsibility, could avert that catastrophe.

My friend from Ohio this morning, as he has in debate heretofore, has undertaken to lay the responsibility for all the suffering and all the war and all the bloodshed that may occur in the Philippine Islands upon those who are opposing the ratification of the treaty in its present form. I wish to say, Mr. Chairman, that those of us here, and on the other side of the Chamber, I believe, who are opposed to the unconditional ratification of that treaty are those who are seeking to save the lives of the American soldiers. We are here pleading for the lives of the volunteers. We are reminding you that we have already more than accomplished all that this war was begun for.

We say to you, "Now that you have done that, take your soldiers away from the Philippine Islands, where they have no business to be; and by so doing you will save thousands of lives."

But the gentleman from Ohio tells us, "If you do not consent to this new policy, if you will not consent to enter upon this policy of imperialism and colonial empire, we will punish you by sacrificing thousands of the lives of American soldiers; we will devote them to disease and death; and then we will lay the death roll at your door." Mr. Chairman, that can not be done. The American people will understand, and the American volunteers will understand, who is responsible. They have done their duty, they have fought this war to a finish, they have accomplished all that was asked or expected of them when this war began, and the responsibility for the death of every other American soldier will rest upon those who are now prosecuting a new war for a new purpose.

Mr. Chairman, my friend from Ohio said the other day that I would be branded as a coward because I wished to withdraw our troops from the Philippine Islands. I want to say to him that there are other cowards in this country, even in Ohio; and I will furnish to my friend from Illinois the third man to make his "three of a kind." I will read just one passage. This is from an interview with John Sherman, late Secretary of State:

> "I am decidedly opposed to the invasion of the Philippines. The idea of our country forcing its way in these islands and forcing its Government upon the 7,000,000 or 9,000,000 population is monstrous. It is subversive of the basic principle of our Government, that the just powers of government are derived from the consent of the governed, and it is in violation of the traditions of our country."
> "Then if you were in the Senate, you would not vote to ratify the treaty of Paris as it stands?"
>
> "If I were in the Senate I would not vote to ratify it as it stands. I would vote to withdraw from the islands as soon as possible."

There is another coward; there is your three of a kind.

Mr. WALKER of Massachusetts. We will all agree to that. Every man of us will agree that we should withdraw military force as soon as we honorably can.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Chairman, I hope the gentleman from Tennessee will listen to what I am about to say——

Mr. CARMACK. I always do.

Mr. GROSVENOR. In order that an end may come to what I deem a matter of the utmost unfairness in his attempted treatment of myself. I know the gentleman does not mean any personal harm to me; but I want him to be fair to me and to others. I have never here or anywhere else on earth ever said or predicted as having come from the Administration any word or sentence——

Mr. CARMACK. I did not say that.

Mr. GROSVENOR. The gentleman has used very adroit language. He started out by saying that he would not charge me with attempting to speak for the Administration except when I said I was speaking for the Administration. He then said that I had on one occasion spoken authoritatively, as I claimed, for the Administration, and he read what he said I had said——

Mr. CARMACK. You used the word "certainly."

Mr. GROSVENOR. I have said nothing of the kind. And now let me state the fairness I demand of the gentleman. Let me read what I said in the State convention at Columbus, Ohio, and see whether or not he will ever again charge me with having used that language with reference to an authoritative statement from the President.

In the first place, it will be seen by a restatement of the matter that I was looking forward—recollect this was on the 21st of June, a date when we had only put our flag upon a little island down there in the harbor of Manila, not on the mainland, but in the harbor; and I was looking forward toward the question of an invasion and a conquest—looking forward to the exact condition we are in now. I used this language:

In the near future important problems will arise out of the war in which the nation is now engaged. Among others will be the disposition to be made of conquered territory. The people can safely leave the wise and patriotic——

Mr. CARMACK. That is from your platform.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Not at all; it is my language.

A MEMBER. That is the same thing.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Yes; that is in the platform. Having written it myself, it is not very strange I should have been for the moment misled.

The people can safely leave the wise and patriotic solution of these great questions to a Republican President and a Republican Congress.

Now, I want to put forward my own language. Let me see whether the gentleman will not at once admit that I did not assume to speak for anybody but myself and that there is nothing in my language which by any fair construction can be supposed or imagined to have been intended by me or understood by anybody else to mean that I assumed to speak for the President.

I make no prognostication except this: I doubt very much whether you or I will live to see the day when by the order of a Republican Administration—and surely not by the order of McKinley's Administration—the starry banner of your country's glory shall be pulled down—

That meant something—from any flagstaff where conquest of arms had placed it.

Now let me read it again exactly as it was intended and as it is now:

I make no prognostication except this: I doubt very much whether you or I will live to see the day when a Republican Administration—and surely I doubt whether we will live to see the time when McKinley's Administration—will order pulling down the flag.

It never was understood by anybody—and the gentleman from Tennessee, standing by himself and uninstigated by anybody on that side of the House, will not repeat, I am sure—that it is a fair construction of that language that I declared I was speaking for the Administration. There is a parenthetical remark thrown in there, controlled entirely by the former part of the sentence, that I would predict that we would never live to see it, and surely never during this Administration. Well, I predict it right now, as I predicted it then; and my prediction will stand good during all the coming six years of this Administration. [Laughter and applause.] I do not care to rediscuss with my friend the question as to who is responsible.

Mr. CARMACK. Mr. Chairman, I desire to occupy the floor but a moment longer in response to what the gentleman from Ohio has said.

I do not wish, sir, to do the gentleman from Ohio the slightest possible injustice. I think he knows that. I quoted the exact language used by the gentleman—I read it to the House in his own words—and the House can put its own construction upon it. Let me refer again to the circumstances under which those remarks were made.

They were made, Mr. Chairman, in reply to certain remarks of mine on the floor of the House. I had argued to the House that the Republican conventions in the recent campaign had not indorsed the policy of the Administration, which I had declared to be a policy of forcible annexation, and especially with reference to the Philippines, the permanent possession of these islands as a province of the United States. In reply to these remarks and to refute them, as I understood, the gentleman quoted from the Ohio platform and from his speech before the Ohio convention.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Now, will the gentleman allow me just there? Did I not reply to that, and say that so far as that part of the suggestion was concerned our convention was held in Ohio on the 21st day of June, and therefore that it could not possibly have made the utterances to which reference was made, and in reference to which the gentleman was complaining, as to the Administration and its policy and its supposed plans?

Mr. CARMACK. Mr. Chairman, I am referring now to the language of the gentleman from Ohio himself.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Very well. I will stand by my language.

Mr. CARMACK. The gentleman has just said that he was looking forward to the condition that exists at the present time when he made the remarks I have quoted. They were made looking forward, I say, to the conquest of the Philippine Islands by force of arms. There can be no other meaning in the language employed.

The gentleman said then, substantially, and repeated it here a few days ago, that "you will never live to see the day, and certainly not under the McKinley Administration, when the starry banner of your country's glory shall be taken down from the flagstaff where it now floats in the Philippine Islands, and where it was placed by force of arms."

And the gentleman from Ohio said a few moments ago, in reference to the platform quoted by him and written by him—and the language used by him before that convention—the gentleman said that it was used with reference "to future conditions and the condition which exists now in the Philippine Islands," and that condition is that these islands have come under our possession "by conquest of arms."

Mr. GROSVENOR. That is right.

Mr. CARMACK. Now, the gentleman has stated that he did not speak for the Administration. I did not mean to say that the gentleman from Ohio was expressly charged with that duty by the Administration, or that he used the exact language furnished to him by the Administration, or that he had been coached by the Administration.

I did not mean that the President of the United States actually told the distinguished gentleman from Ohio to come into this Hall and say to this body exactly what he did say. The gentleman from Ohio is too intelligent a representative of the Administration to need any such specific instructions. The gentleman breathes the air of the White House; he comes here with the odor of its sanctity about him. [Laughter.] He knows all the varying moods and shifting opinions of the Administration.

Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana. I do not believe it possible for any man to register them. [Laughter and applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. CARMACK. I think the gentleman from Indiana is correct. I am inclined to agree with my friend on that point; but at all events my friend from Ohio who has just taken his seat seems to think that he knows them; and when he says anything on the subject; when he uses, especially, language such as has been quoted; when he says, "surely something will be done by the Administration," or "surely something will not be done" by it, the gentleman knows what the Administration means and intends at that particular moment of time, or at least he thinks he does. [Laughter.]

Mr. GROSVENOR. Now, if the gentleman will allow me to put it into his remarks, I will say if it were a mere guess on my part, it was a mighty good one, was it not?

Mr. CARMACK. I do not know; neither do you.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Well, time will tell.

Mr. CARMACK. Whatever may be the opinion of my distinguished friend from Ohio, I do not believe that any of us can predict that. We are all "guessing" at present.

Mr. HULL. Mr. Chairman, this is an amendment pending before the committee to give to the veterinary surgeons in the Army a certain rank—the rank of a second lieutenant of cavalry. I think the House is ready to vote upon it.

I ask a vote now upon the pending amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. HAY] to the amendment offered by the chairman of the committee.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. I hope the gentleman will not demand a vote yet.

Mr. HULL. The gentleman from New Jersey objects to my closing debate immediately, and I move that all debate be closed in ten minutes.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. I do not want to talk on this. I simply want to offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa moves that all debate on the pending paragraph and amendments be closed in ten minutes.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. I have an amendment simply to put the word "assimilated" before the word "rank."

The CHAIRMAN. The motion of the gentleman from Iowa to close debate is unnecessary at this time. Debate has already been exhausted on these two amendments, and the Chair will put the question to a vote.

Mr. HULL. The amendment to the amendment was accepted, as I understand?

The CHAIRMAN. Has the gentleman from Iowa accepted the amendment of the gentleman from Virginia?

Mr. HULL. I understand the gentleman from New Jersey offers an amendment to the amendment of the gentleman from Virginia which was accepted by the committee.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Insert in line 7, page 3, after the word "the," the word "assimilated."

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. The object of the amendment is to make veterinaries have assimilated rank and not full rank.

Mr. HULL. I hope that amendment will be voted down. I think they ought to have full rank, and I want to say to the gentleman from New Jersey that we have in the Army the poorest class of veterinary surgeons in the United States, because they have not the rank to enforce their orders; and assimilated rank will not fill the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment of the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. PARKER] is not yet in order. The vote will be taken on the amendment to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Virginia.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. Now the gentleman from New Jersey offers the amendment just read from the desk. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the gentleman from New Jersey, which is an amendment to the amendment.

Mr. LACEY. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word, in order to ask the chairman of the committee——

The CHAIRMAN. That motion is not in order. Two amendments are now pending.

Mr. HULL. I yield to my colleague for a question.

Mr. LACEY. I want to ask the gentleman, in regard to the necessity of this amendment, as to what the rule is in other countries. Take Germany, France, and other countries that have a large regular army. What is the rank of veterinary surgeons? I want to know whether this is a new thing or whether it is something that has been done heretofore, and we should like to have some reasons given. The debate has gone off on the question of the Philippines instead of on these horse doctors, and I want to know about the horse doctors.

Mr. HULL. I think there is no question that in the German army they have rank.

Mr. HAY. I can state to the gentleman that I know as a positive fact that the rank of veterinary surgeon in the German army goes up as high as major and lieutenant-colonel.

Mr. HULL. My colleague has looked that up.

Mr. McCLELLAN. I think, if the gentleman will permit me, it is assimilated rank, and that surgeons have assimilated rank as well.

Mr. HULL. For all outside of the general staff the rank is assimilated in the German army.

Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana. I did not hear what the gentleman from Iowa said in respect to the lack of competency of our veterinary surgeons.

Mr. HULL. Many of the veterinary surgeons in the Army today are men who have been gradually worked in from the position of farriers. They have grown old in the service. You can not get the best class of veterinary surgeons to accept positions in the Army, for the reason that they have no rank. They have no power to enforce their orders. Their grade is simply that of noncommissioned officers, and if they find horses that are diseased, they report the fact to an officer of the company or regiment, and if he does not agree with them they are powerless to protect the property of the United States. Now, Mr. Chairman, I have one word further——

Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana. Right in that connection, I want to say to my friend that I know personally that there are a great number of very competent veterinary surgeons in this country who are graduates of schools, for there are some very fine veterinary colleges both in this country and Canada. I know men who are graduates of these schools, men who possess high intelligence and culture; and I have on my desk in my room five or six letters from gentlemen just of that character urging that some provision be made for them in this Army bill. That is why I asked the question. I do not entertain the shadow of a doubt but that we have as high a class of veterinary surgeons in this country as in any country, unless it is England.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. HULL. I have the floor yet. I hope my friend will not take that out of my time. I want to say that the object of this amendment is to get the best veterinary surgeons into the Army. We have, as you say, the best educated veterinary surgeons in the world in this country—as good as they have in England—but they will not go into the Army because of the lack of rank, the lack of standing in the Army, and the lack of protection in their professional work.

Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. HULL. Now, hold on one minute. My time is only five minutes. Let me give you an illustration. In talking to the Secretary of Agriculture, when this matter was before the committee, he stated that the War Department had called upon the Agricultural Department to send veterinary surgeons from the Agricultural Department to Florida to take charge of the sick animals. Why? Why, because in the Agricultural Department the veterinary is recognized as belonging to an educated profession, and they have the very best in the country drawn to the service of the Department there, while in our Army we have not been able to get good veterinary surgeons on account of the way they are treated in the Army. They are not recognized.

Mr. BELKNAP. Being without rank, they can not enforce their orders.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. Mr. Chairman, I think I ought to have a minute.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has five minutes.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. I do not want that much.

The provision to give proper pay and recognition to the skill and education of the veterinary surgeon has my heartiest support. The veterinary surgeons should have the shoulder straps and a position in the Army which will give them authority over the men. They should have every honor that belongs to that part of the staff that do not have actual command or act in the actual fighting line.

We are reorganizing the Army, and the question is whether the lawyers who help in courts-martial as judge-advocates, or the business men who manage the accounts as paymasters, or the accountants and bookkeepers who attend merely to the war office, or even the skilled professional men who attend to the horses' health should have more than assimilated rank and pay and honors. We alone of modern nations give them the actual rank and title of command—general, colonel, major, captain, and lieutenant—which many of us think should belong only to those actually in command.

This is the first sentence of the bill that raises the question of the true position of this part of the staff.

I for one believe they should have the assimilated rank, but not full rank. I have never believed in giving paymasters full rank, or men who work only in offices and not at the front.

They should have an assimilative rating, but not full rank and right to go on the retired list, because they do not risk their lives in the fight. There perhaps should be an exception for surgeons, who, by their very profession, are required to go on the battlefield, and for that reason ought to have full rank. Veterinary surgeons would perhaps not be required to be up with the regiment in front, but would find their proper post elsewhere.

Mr. GRIFFIN. Why not?

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. They are to take care of the teams.

Mr. GRIFFIN. The horses are at the front.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. But, perhaps they would not be taking care of them in the front. It is with reference to all parts of the staff who are not forced to be at the front that there is question whether the staff rank should be the full rank of an officer with full power to go on the retired list. This principle is partially followed as to surgeons. It is well known that while a certain number of them serve in the line, others are only called in for a time as acting assistants. They are given their authority and honor and shoulder straps, and serve in the Medical Department, but not as a part of the permanent staff; and it was for that reason that I used the word "assimilated," not with any idea of being against giving the veterinarian and his noble occupation proper recognition, but so as to raise this general and fundamental question as to staff rank in many of its branches.

Mr. RIDGELY. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will be recognized for two minutes.

[Mr. RIDGELY addressed the committee. See Appendix.]

The question was taken on the amendment; and the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The question now is on the amendment of the gentleman from Iowa.

[Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri addressed the committee. See Appendix.]

Mr. HULL. Mr. Chairman, I now ask for a vote on this amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HULL. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise. A portion of the day has been set apart for eulogies, and the gentlemen are now ready to proceed.

Mr. HAY. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry. I would like to know whether, if the committee now rises, we shall still be on the same section when we go into Committee of the Whole again?

Mr. HULL. Certainly.

The CHAIRMAN. Yes.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. PAYNE, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 11022) to reorganize the Army, and for other purposes, and had come to no resolution thereon.

Mr. HULL. Mr. Speaker, I want to ask unanimous consent that the superintendent of the folding room may send enough of the Army reorganization bills to the desk of the Clerk in the Hall, so that members may get them there. A great many members have not realized yet that they must write an order to get them, and they are continually coming here for them.

The SPEAKER. Will the gentleman from Iowa indicate what number?

Mr. HULL. Two hundred.

Mr. BARTLETT. Why not put them on the desk of each member of the House?

Mr. HULL. Because in that way probably many of them would get lost. There can be 200 brought here and put on the desk of the Clerk and still leave a large number in the folding room.

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. Speaker, these bills are now assigned to individual members. Can the House change that assignment? I think it can not.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks it is a doubtful question.

Mr. HULL. I suppose by unanimous consent they can take one here for each member.

Mr. PAYNE. I think this question could be solved, Mr. Speaker, by members signing an order and sending it by a page when they want a copy.

The SPEAKER. Objection is made.

EULOGIES ON THE LATE HON. JOHN SIMPKINS.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the special order for to-day.

The Clerk read as follows:

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, Tuesday, January 17, 1899.

Resolved, That Saturday, January 28, 1899, be set apart for the purpose of paying tribute to the memory of Hon. JOHN SIMPKINS, late a member of the House of Representatives from the State of Massachusetts.

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I offer the resolution which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the business of the House be now suspended that opportunity may be given for tributes to the memory of Hon. JOHN SIMPKINS, late a Representative from the State of Massachusetts.

Resolved, That as a particular mark of respect to the memory of the deceased, and in recognition of his eminent abilities as a distinguished public servant, the House, at the conclusion of these memorial proceedings, shall stand adjourned.

Resolved, That the Clerk communicate these resolutions to the Senate.

Resolved, That the Clerk be instructed to send a copy of these resolutions to the family of the deceased.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, as the successor of the late Mr. SIMPKINS, I approach the difficult task of expressing a tribute to his memory with a great deal of diffidence.

My opportunities of intimate association with him were few, as he resided in a portion of the district quite remote from my home. But the impressions formed upon my first visit to his house were fully borne out in my subsequent relations with him. He sat surrounded by a well-stocked library in his elegant home, and from his conversation and expressive language I realized that this library was among the choicest of his possessions, and that his familiarity with it would be one of his strongest weapons of offense and defense in the performance of the duties which would devolve upon him as a Representative of his district in the National House, to which position he had decided to aspire in response to the wishes of his friends and neighbors, who had, in a formal petition from the citizens of every town in Barnstable County, expressed their desire that he should thus serve them.

More than fifty years had elapsed since this county had been represented in the National House, and at no time previously had there been that unanimity of sentiment expressed for the selection of a candidate.

I shall refer somewhat briefly to some of the acts of his Congressional life, but I doubt not some other member associated with him in his work will much more fittingly refer to his achievements here.

Mr. SIMPKINS was born in New Bedford, Mass., June 27, 1862, and died in Washington, March 26, 1898, after a very brief illness. In early childhood he removed to Yarmouth, Mass., where he attended the public schools of the town, which was ever after his home. He afterwards attended St. Mark's School, at Southboro, and entered and graduated at Harvard College. He was always active in the public affairs of his town, and for several years served upon the school committee. He seemed destined for a career of public service. He was elected and served in the State senate of Massachusetts in 1891 and 1892, and might have been reelected for many years, but he laid down the honors which might have been easily his to take a special course in economics at Harvard College, in order that he might be the better fitted to take up the sterner duties of more rugged manhood.

He had always been active in the councils of the Republican party, serving with marked ability for several years upon the State committee, and with great distinction and honor as the second president of the Republican Club of Massachusetts, succeeding the present Governor Wolcott in this honorable office. He had also been Presidential elector in 1892.

Nothing that could be of interest to his fellow-townsmen or associates in Barnstable County escaped his attention.

Although young in years, he became a leader. In all matters he was looked up to very much as a child looks to a parent, and he entered into every phase of life which surrounded him. He was essentially a Cape Cod boy. His great-grandfather, John Simpkins, was for many years a minister at Brewster. His grandfather, Nathaniel S. Simpkins, was a man of prominence in the county and held many positions of trust, and was the editor and publisher of the first newspaper in the county. His father was a very successful business man. For many years Mr. SIMPKINS had been very actively interested in the Barnstable County Agricultural Society, serving as its president, contributing his splendid vigor and earnest, painstaking labor toward its successful maintenance. Inheriting considerable wealth, to which he added by careful investment, his was not the life of contentment and ease which, alas! too many similarly situated regard as their proper station.

He was elected to the Fifty-fourth Congress and reelected to the Fifty-fifth Congress, and seemed destined for a long and successful career in public life. He entered with great earnestness upon his duties, mastering subjects of public interest in such a manner that he was able to creditably sustain himself in the conflict of debate with those who had rendered very much longer service in the House. He very strongly presented arguments for the repeal of the "compulsory pilotage law," for it was of great interest to the mariners of his district, and he expressed himself very intensely, because the injustice of it to them had been burned into his very soul by those of his constituents with whom he had been intimately associated.

The varied wants of the district he represented were his constant care, and no service which the humblest sought from him was overlooked. It meant for him a life of service and of toil, and yet he never complained, for he seemed best satisfied when he was making the burdens of others less burdensome and when he could gratify the wishes of some humble constituent. The expressions of kindness coming from his associates here, without distinction of party or social surroundings, have been very gratifying to myself and to his friends.

Since his death an elegant library of choice books has been presented to the Yarmouth High School by his sister, Mrs. Bacon. It was a gift to the school in his memory, and it is known as "The John Simpkins Library."

No gift could have been better chosen as a memorial, nor could there have been anything more in accordance with his personal wishes had it been possible for him to give expression thereto. Above the library case is an excellent portrait of the late Congressman, and as the present and coming generations enjoy the advantages which this library affords they will constantly be reminded of the deep interest which he took in the cause of education and of his brief but eventful and honorable career.

The Boston Journal, in an editorial referring to Mr. SIMPKINS's death, said:

It abruptly ends a career which has been as successful and useful as has been achieved by any public man of his years in Massachusetts. He sought public life because it was congenial to his personal tastes, and because he was unwilling to do as he might have done, and as many men of his fortunate class have always done, and made his ample means the pretext for a life of elegant idleness.

The Washington Post, in the closing paragraph of an editorial referring to his death, used the following words:

Here is a life of promise suddenly cut short. A strong man in the heyday of his maturity and at the threshold of his usefulness has been stricken down. A staunch and loyal friend, a brave and honorable gentleman, a fine specimen of simple and straightforward and unselfish manhood, he will be mourned as it is the fate of few to be mourned—with genuine sorrow and affection.

His loss will be keenly felt among his associates here, but the grief of his family and more intimate friends will be the more poignant and lasting because of the shock which came so suddenly upon them and blasted their brightest and most cherished hopes.

Mr. SWANSON. Mr. Speaker, I shall deliver no elaborate eulogium upon our deceased friend. I shall not undertake to give the details of his young life, crowded with successes, covered with honors, and crowned, at his early death, with brilliant promises. This has been admirably performed by the distinguished member from his own State who succeeds him.

I desire to speak only of Mr. SIMPKINS as a member of this House, and of the impressions produced upon me by an acquaintance and an association with him.

Mr. SIMPKINS impressed every one who met him as being possessed of a gentle, kindly disposition, full of generosity, and abounding with the love of humanity. He was frank and open. He scorned all disguises, all concealments. His aims being high, his purposes pure, he neither needed nor used any of the acts of political dissimulation. It was impossible to meet a person more straightforward, more truthful than Mr. SIMPKINS. He expressed his convictions clearly and fearlessly. Personally he was of the most lovable nature, held in high esteem and affection by all who knew him. His friendships were genuine and sincere. He was generous and gave liberally of his large means. He was modest, refined, unpretentious. It was rare to meet a character so full of excellencies, so devoid of defects. His qualities of mind were more substantial than shining. His intellect was clear, strong, and vigorous. It could grasp any subject fully and hold it firmly.

He was highly educated and possessed splendid intellectual attainments. In Congress he was one of the useful and not merely ornamental members. His time was faithfully used in looking after the interest of his constituency or the legislation of his country, and not entirely in the preparation of speeches for personal display. He made a most capable and efficient Representative, serving his people and country well.

He was always a Republican, but never allowed partisan feeling to stand in the way of a just judgment. All public matters received from him a most liberal and intelligent consideration. He was in all respects a worthy son of the great Commonwealth that gave him birth. In his attributes of heart and qualities of mind he illustrated those steady virtues which have made his State and her achievements famous the world over.

His early death ended a pure and an unselfish life. It closed a career brilliant with prospects for the future.

Mr. WALKER of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, scarcely has the death of a Congressman been such a shock to his colleagues and friends as that of Hon. JOHN SIMPKINS.

The very picture of health, with a physique that indicated the very highest ideal of physical powers and long life, we had scarcely heard of his slight indisposition before the tidings reached us of his death.

Having an ample fortune, he early decided to devote himself to public affairs. Having held many official and semiofficial places of high honor, he was first elected to the Fifty-fourth Congress.

In the discharge of his duties in committee and on the floor he was exceptionally conscientious and industrious, and displayed rare good judgment and discretion. Massachusetts anticipated for him a career of great usefulness, which his brief service in the House fully warranted.

He was a worthy representative of a noble constituency.

Mr. WEYMOUTH. Mr. Speaker, little did I think when I became a member of this body that the first words I should utter on the floor would be spoken as a tribute to the memory of our late brother, JOHN SIMPKINS. Yet such is the case. I first met him at the Republican national convention at St. Louis, in 1896, though I had known him by reputation for several years. The drawing of seats at the beginning of the Fifty-fifth Congress placed me immediately in front of him; consequently I saw a great deal of him from that time until he was taken away. My attention was at first especially called to him by an act of kindness shown a young friend of mine who was calling on me at the time and who was a total stranger to him. On account of that kindly act, and largely through his influence, that boy is now a page in this House. It was then that I first began to realize the make-up of the man and the many noble qualities he possessed. Several times he took a seat by my side during the extra session and asked me as a new member how I was getting along, and offering to render me any assistance in his power. Nothing is so much appreciated by new members who come here almost entire strangers as such treatment from older members.

Incidents like those I have mentioned prove more conclusively his kind heart, sweet disposition, and generous impulses than any words of general eulogy can do.

Mr. Speaker, well do I remember his last day in this House. The day previous he came to me and said that he was going to introduce a bill regarding some public land in his district which would be referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, of which I have the honor to be a member, and asked for information regarding the form of making out the bill. I explained it to him as best I could, and to further assist him I sent a page to the committee room for several bills of like nature that had already been introduced, who through some misunderstanding returned without them. Much against his wishes, I then went myself and brought them to him, and I shall never forget his appreciation of that service. The next day he touched me on the shoulder and returned the bills, saying he had gotten all the information necessary, and again heartily thanked me for my trouble, as he termed it. This was the last time I saw JOHN SIMPKINS or heard his voice, but it will always be a pleasant recollection that in our very last intercourse I was permitted to reciprocate, even in a small way, his many courtesies and kindnesses to me.

Many times I have wondered why such a life of promise should be cut down so suddenly on the very threshold of its usefulness, and can arrive at but one conclusion:

God moves in a mysterious way
His wonders to perform.

Born amid wealth and refinement, he could have lived a life of leisure, but he chose rather a busy and industrious one, working for the welfare of others. He was one of the most generous and hospitable men that it has ever been my good fortune to meet. He possessed every quality to endear himself to all who came in contact with him in whatever capacity. He never spoke on the floor to hear himself talk; but when he did speak, two characteristics impressed his hearers, his earnestness and his sincerity. He was an able representative of one of the most important constituencies of the old Bay State, and will be sadly missed.

Mr. Speaker, a long eulogy on the life and character of JOHN SIMPKINS is not necessary. All that need be said of him can be summed up in these few words: He was born one of nature's noblemen, his record was without spot or blemish, he will be mourned with sincere sorrow and affection, and his memory will be cherished as an inspiration by all who knew him.

Angels of life and death are His,
Without His leave, they pass no threshold o'er,
Who, then, would wish or dare, believing this,
Against His messengers to shut the door?

Mr. LOVERING. Mr. Speaker, nearly a year has rolled by since we laid away in the cold sands of Cape Cod all that was mortal of JOHN SIMPKINS. The lapse of time has not dimmed the immortalities that we have laid away in our hearts. In life he was not a man to pass by in easy forgetfulness. In death fond memories draw ever closer the bonds of endearment that sprung from his own strong personality and affectionate nature. While yet a young man he determined upon an earnest career, and brought to bear a vigorous individuality and a concentration of purpose that soon raised him high in public estimation and made him a wise counselor and an able legislator.

He had a strong and healthy mind, and whatever he undertook he did with singleness of purpose, great thoroughness, and conscientious zeal. He was a champion of the oppressed and always an unostentatious friend of the unfortunate. He could call everyone friend, and all who came near him felt the influence of his genial character. Accomplished in all the arts of friendship, amiable, and gracious in manner and bearing, he was able to summon to his aid a host of friends to assist him in any cause he espoused. Such a life was rich in lessons for all those who would turn aside from the luring temptations of ease and luxury and devote themselves to the public weal. Such a memory is fragrant with the recollections of a pure, gentle, and noble nature. It is fitting that we should record in tender words our appreciation of his public service and thank God for the useful years of this young life.

Mr. FOSS. Mr. Speaker, and I, too, knew him. I come not so much to pay the tribute of a fellow-legislator who closely watched the career of JOHN SIMPKINS in his Congressional life, but rather to speak of him as a classmate and friend. A little over seventeen years ago we entered the same college together, and for four years, while my acquaintance with him was not intimate, I marked his course. Active in college sports, foremost in all class movements, earnest in all his undertakings, he enjoyed great popularity among his associates. He was congenial, considerate of the feelings of others, large-hearted, sympathetic, and drew men to him by the tender cords of good-fellowship and affection. He was not a bookworm. He spent comparatively little time in study, as he was quick to learn, but always ranked well in his class, and when he graduated he left behind him an honorable record.

JOHN SIMPKINS was an ambitious man. Some men born into the world under conditions of wealth and ease would have been content with an aimless life. Wealth usually has this effect upon men—to enervate them, to take away that better part of their nature which seeks the pathway of honor and of fame. But it did not have this effect on him. On the contrary, it seemed only to stimulate him to greater incentive to make a name for himself that would be honored after he was gone. In this respect his life will always stand out as a splendid example to those young men in our country to-day who, born in affluence and educated in our greatest institutions, do not feel the necessity of entering into the struggle of life with their fellows, and of giving the best of themselves to public causes and to public good.

JOHN SIMPKINS was a generous, philanthropic, and charitable man. The world will never know how much he gave to those who needed, and when he gave, it was without ostentation, but quietly, without the knowledge of anyone except the beneficiary. I know of numerous cases where, when the giver became known, it displeased him and he refused to renew his generous contributions. There was no selfishness in his kind nature. When he gave, he gave to bless others and sought not blessings for himself.

While some, not acquainted with him, might at first judge him as one of aristocratic ideas and notions, yet when they came within the circle of his friendship and knew him as he was, they found him the most democratic of men. There was no man whom misfortune or circumstances had humbled who lost his friendship on that account. Wherever he could do a friendly act he was glad to do it, and one or two instances I know of where he assisted strangers who lived far from his own Congressional district and from whom he could receive no recompense.

He was an industrious and persistent man. He accomplished results. While of large affairs, yet he gave himself to all the little details which might seem to one overburdened as he was too trivial for his care.

In his legislative career all marked him as an earnest, conscientious Representative; a man who, if he had lived, would have carved out for himself a large place of influence and power in this Legislative Assembly.

One can not hope in a short time to make himself a great factor in this Assembly. It takes years of patient industry, of hard and laborious work, and of conscious endeavor to fill the place of one whom but two weeks ago we honored as a national leader and statesman. For a while one who enters here must enter like a humble worshiper, who gropes his way along a dark and shadowy aisle, now and then receiving inspiration from streaks of heavenly light, but still groping on, after much toil finds himself at last out in the broad cathedral under the swelling dome, and takes his place and rank among the legislators of his time.

We can say this justly of JOHN SIMPKINS, that he had started well; that he had made substantial progress on the way, and that he showed the promise of a public life full of high attainment, rich in honor and service to his country.

JOHN SIMPKINS was always the same. He never appeared different from what he really was. Whether in the recitation room, where he was attentive to his work, or speeding across the field, winning laurels for his college eleven amid the admiring plaudits of his fellows, or in the quiet seclusion of his own home, where generous hospitality always reigned; or in the streets of his native town, where there were none too humble to receive his courtesy; or on this floor, where he won honors for himself and gave faithful service to his constituency, he was always the same genial, large-hearted, broad-minded man, who belonged to Nature's true nobility. In his death we have lost a generous colleague, his brother and sisters a loving companion, his friends everywhere a sympathetic man, his Congressional district an industrious and able Representative, and Massachusetts, sir, who always sends her best men here to represent her, one of her noble sons, true to her teachings, and loyal to her fame.

Mr. MOODY. Mr. Speaker, I can hope to add little to the tributes which have already been paid to our departed colleague by the few words which I shall speak. Though they be few, they shall be sincere. Needless as it may be, I can not refrain from adding my testimony to his fidelity as a representative of the people and to the simple beauty of his character. Though the election of Mr. SIMPKINS preceded my own by a year, we began our service together in this Chamber on the opening day of the Fifty-fourth Congress. My acquaintance with him had been but slight. I thought of him then as the favorite of fortune, whose caprice had bestowed upon him the honor of a seat upon this floor. I supposed that the duties and responsibilities of the place would rest lightly upon him. Every day of our common service led me to correct my estimate and convinced me of my error. Respect, esteem, and friendship followed each other in quick succession. I learned to know well how earnest was his desire to guard the interests of the people who had honored him and to render faithful service to the Republic. He met every responsibility. He discharged every duty. None seemed to him small enough to be neglected, and none great enough to be avoided.

He was a constant attendant upon the daily sessions of the House, watching its proceedings with zealous care, and scrutinizing the measures before it with intelligence. Though he did not with frequency participate in its deliberations by speech, when he did so it was modestly, forcibly, and to the point. With the members of the delegation from the Commonwealth of Massachusetts he came to be considered their most trusted and sagacious counselor. As his services lengthened his views broadened, and we always knew that his opinions were untouched by mean, petty, or narrow considerations. No one rendered better service to the Commonwealth during the weary months of the construction of the tariff bill which so deeply affected her interests. He was always at his post, ready to enlist in any just cause which was brought to his attention.

But it is more especially as a man that I like to think of him now. He was upright and sincere, despising falsehood and adhering to the truth always and at whatever cost. He may well serve as a model to us all in every relation of life. Affectionate and lovable to his friends, he daily strengthened their affection and love for him. Always putting others before himself, he seemed not to understand the quality of selfishness. In relations too sacred to be mentioned here there can be no consolation for his untimely death. Eager for public service and fitted for it, favored with apparent health and vigor and with fortune, which left him the leisure for work, and ready for it, blessed with the growing regard of his constituency and troops of friends and loving kindred, he seemed destined to a long career of happiness, honor, and usefulness. When the end came, it was without warning, and the shock of his sudden death has not yet departed from us. As we placed him in the soil of his native State, near to his ancestral home and by the shores of the sounding sea, it seemed as if we had returned to her bosom something of the elements which have given her strength, riches, and renown.

I know not what epitaph will be inscribed over his resting place, but whether it is so written or not, there is to lie forever the body of a loving son and brother, of a steadfast friend, of a faithful public servant, and of a pure and loyal soul.

Mr. Speaker, my colleague [Mr. MCCALL], who is confined to his home by illness, has requested me to read his contribution to these services.

Mr. MCCALL. Mr. Speaker, I am unable to attend the session of the House to-day on account of illness, but I can not forbear to send an expression, brief and imperfect as it must necessarily be, of my high appreciation of JOHN SIMPKINS.

I knew him before he was elected to any office and was intimately acquainted with the way he bore himself in his political campaigns and as a senator in Massachusetts and a Representative in Congress. He was distinguished by industry, fine judgment, and a natural aptitude for the discussion of public questions. His administrative talents were of high value to his party. His death was a great loss, not merely to his Commonwealth, but to the nation, for there is no office which he might not have aspired to fill and which he could not have filled with honor.

His loss was one most grievous to be borne by those who were his friends, and his kindly and genial nature could not shut itself up in any narrow circle. He had many warm friends in all classes of life. The people at his home loved him, and the tidings of his death carried the keenest sorrow to many an humble fisherman's cottage on the shores of his own beloved Cape Cod. Genial, kindly, and loyal, his loss left a void which time does not fill. The noble words of Emerson exactly apply to him:

> His heart was as great as the world, but there was no room in it to hold the memory of a wrong.

Mr. BERRY. Mr. Speaker, we are assembled under a resolution for the purpose of paying tribute to the memory of JOHN SIMPKINS, late a member of this body. I never knew Mr. SIMPKINS until he came here, chosen by the people of his district to a seat in this body. A very close friend and relative, who had been his instructor in Harvard College, wrote me, "Make the acquaintance of JOHN SIMPKINS; you will find him a noble fellow." These words were more than verified when I came to know him well. We were members of the same committee, the Merchant Marine and Fisheries, where he performed much intelligent and valuable work for the whole country, and especially for his immediate constituency, who were so much interested in subjects that naturally came before this committee, his district bordering along the Atlantic seaboard. He was always prompt in attendance upon his committee and faithful in the discharge of his duties on the floor. His great contention was for free-pilotage laws, in which the sailors of his district were deeply interested, and for which measure he made a very able argument. He was the friend of the sailors, so many of whom were his constituents, favoring giving them more comfortable conditions for sleeping, prescribing the amount of space to be allotted to each seaman, and specifying the food that shall be allowed, so as to secure better sanitary surroundings. The work of JOHN SIMPKINS is bearing fruit to-day, for at this very session those ideas have become law, largely attributable to his services in the Fifty-fourth Congress in pressing these measures upon this body.

Mr. SIMPKINS had been honored by his State. He was twice a member of its legislature. He took an active part in the matters about his home, in public improvements, schools, indeed in everything that was of practicable benefit to his community. He was possessed of a handsome fortune, which he enjoyed in a liberal, magnanimous fashion. His lovely residence in this city, adorned by his bright, intelligent sisters, made it one of the most agreeable and hospitable homes of Washington. In the six years I have been in Congress death has often visited this Chamber and many noble men have suddenly been taken from the boisterous scenes of legislation. There was not, perhaps, upon the floor a more perfect specimen of health and manhood than Mr. SIMPKINS; yet in a few days the icy hand of Death touched his manly form.

Scarcely had we heard he was sick until his death was announced, startling his friends that one such a picture of health should be called so suddenly. How many have been called! Mr. Dingley was taken after a brief illness, and General Garland, distinguished statesman and lawyer, dropped dead on the floor of the Supreme Court. Truly, may we say with the poet—

> Death rides on every passing breeze,
> He lurks in every flower.

I was honored by being designated by the Speaker as one of his pallbearers from this body, and accompanied the remains to their final resting place at Yarmouth.

Governor Wolcott and members of the legislature of the old

Bay State met us at the depot in Boston with deepest expressions of sympathy.

As we approached his home at Yarmouth there was universal mourning. People of all condition were present with every evidence of profound sympathy. Men, women, and children—the whole community had gathered about his home.

We laid him away in the soil of his native State, near the roar of the great Atlantic, which he loved so well. I would say, "Requiescat in pace!"

Mr. SPRAGUE. Mr. Speaker, so much has been said of our deceased friend, Mr. SIMPKINS, by those who have preceded me, and so much will be said by those who are to follow, that I hesitate to attempt to contribute anything to these eulogies. But I wish to say a word in regard to my friendship with JOHN SIMPKINS, a friendship beginning early in our lives. I knew him when he was a young man, graduating from St. Mark's; and when he went to Harvard I had the opportunity to study his character still more. He became a good scholar and a fine man. Not confining himself exclusively to study, he engaged in athletic exercises of every kind. He was foremost in football. In every way he sought to lead a life which would fit him for the future.

Reflecting upon the friendly spirit which was characteristic of him, I recall an incident which I shall never forget. Two years ago, when the opening proceedings of this Congress were in progress, he and I were waiting for our names to be called during the drawing for seats. Mr. SIMPKINS, having been called, had chosen his seat when my name was reached. I was about to make my choice when he beckoned me to come to a seat beside him. This little incident furnishes, as I have said, an incident of his friendliness of character; he always thought of others; he looked out for his friends; he was of a generous spirit; his heart was open to all.

Doubting, as I have said, my ability to add much to what other members contribute to these memorial proceedings, I may still be permitted to follow in a personal way some of the incidents of his career. I had the honor of representing a district in the legislature of our State when he represented the Cape in the senate. I saw the good work he did at that time in looking after the interests of his constituents. He was a prominent figure in the senate. At that time he was one of the political opponents of the late William E. Russell; yet they were on the most intimate terms of personal friendship. This illustrates the liberal character of Mr. SIMPKINS. He did not allow political differences to interfere with his personal friendships.

He was a charming companion. I have been with him in the South when we were together shooting. At night, when everything was peaceful and when we gathered around the fire, he showed himself to be most delightful in conversation.

When he finished his term in the senate, the following year he was a Presidential elector and became the president of the Republican Club of Massachusetts, where he showed great power in the way of organization.

In 1894 there was a call from the Cape end of the Thirteenth district that it should have a representative in Congress, as no representation had been granted that section for over thirty years. Mr. SIMPKINS was selected, nominated, and elected by a large majority, and so valuable were his services that he was reelected in 1896 for a second term. Before taking his seat he familiarized himself with his district and its needs, and particularly with regard to the harbors, coastwise trade, and commerce generally, which enabled him to appear before the committees in Congress in an interesting way. He was very successful in having his projects adopted, and when he was to speak on such matters his colleagues listened, for he was talking about that which he thoroughly understood. Just before his untimely death he was selected by the unanimous vote of his colleagues from Massachusetts to represent them on the Republican Congressional Committee, and this was their tribute to his good judgment.

He was always devoted to the Cape district, where he resided from early childhood and where he spent all of his leisure hours. In Congress he was much respected for his sterling character, his honesty, his genial nature, and his powers of persuasion. His intimate friends will never forget the loss they have sustained.

I can say no more at present. I have expressed myself simply in the language of one who regarded JOHN SIMPKINS as a dear friend. Recalling him as he sat at his desk next me, and regretting deeply his loss, I feel the inadequacy of any tribute I can pay to his memory.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, in the prime of life, apparently in the enjoyment of a vigorous manhood, JOHN SIMPKINS was stricken by the hand of Death.

Though young in years, he had attained high honors at the hands of the people of his State, and a brilliant and honorable career awaited him had he lived. Plucked as he was by the hand of Death in the noonday of his career, his life and deeds marked him as a remarkable man.

I knew him in public life before I became associated with him as a member of this body, and I always admired his fairness and frankness in discussing the public questions of the day. He was not an intense partisan.

I remember particularly well his admiration for the talent and ability of our lamented young Governor Russell, and I know that this feeling was reciprocated by Mr. Russell.

Mr. SIMPKINS believed in toleration, and would not condemn a man who differed with him upon the public questions of the day.

It was my privilege to serve with him on the Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries. It was remarkable to witness the devotion of this man, although of unlimited means himself, to the welfare of the fishermen and the sailors. I remember the painstaking study that he gave to the bill which was to regulate the character of food that was to be served aboard ship to the sailors, and I know that it was he who drew up the report advocating the reform and improvement in the sailors' food. On every measure which came before that committee JOHN SIMPKINS'S voice and vote were recorded in favor of beneficial legislation for the fisherman and sailor. I think this is the highest tribute that can be paid to his character. He was not a great orator. When he addressed the House his words were few, but well chosen, and always delivered with great earnestness.

He was an intense lover of his native State, and Massachusetts may well preserve his memory among her fondest treasures. His star, which climbed so steadily and shone so brightly in the zenith of the heavens, fell like a meteor in the darkness of the night and shines no more. His remains now lie embedded in the soil of his beloved State, and his grave looks calmly out at the soothing sea as it sings sad requiems on that stern, rock-bound coast. The world is the loser by his death. His monument rests in the hearts of the people of Cape Cod, whom he loved so well, rather than in enduring stone or bronze.

The visible form of our colleague has passed away, but I know that honor and glory await him in the resurrection of the just.

As shadows cast by cloud and sun
Flit in the summer's grass,
So in Thy spirit, Almighty One,
Earth's generations pass;
And as the years, an endless host,
Come pressing swiftly on,
The brightest names that earth can boast
Just glisten and are gone.

Mr. LAWRENCE. Mr. Speaker, I realize that it is unnecessary for me to add anything to the affectionate, eloquent, and just tributes which have been to-day paid to the memory of JOHN SIMPKINS. And yet I wish to take advantage of this opportunity to speak of the loss which has come to my Commonwealth and to give expression to my own sense of personal loss. I can never forget the cordial and hearty welcome which he extended to me, "a stranger in a strange land," when I entered upon my duties as a member of this House at the beginning of the last session of Congress. During the few short months of my service with him here I received at his hands constant kindness and never-failing courtesy. He was a man of heart, and delighted in nothing so much as in giving pleasure to his friends. His whole life was characterized by kind words and helpful deeds. His genial presence made the world seem brighter and happier, and wherever he went he carried sunshine with him. I sometimes think we do not fully appreciate how helpful is such a happy temperament as his. Companionship with men like him brings hope and courage, drives away melancholy, and makes life better worth living. If he had troubles, he did not inflict them upon his friends; he evidently believed with all his heart the gospel of cheerfulness.

JOHN SIMPKINS was a successful man. In public life I do not remember that he had ever known defeat. That success was due to marked executive ability, persistence, fairness, and capacity for work. There was nothing negative about him. Active and practical in whatever position he was placed, he became a positive force and made his influence felt. He thought for himself, and developed those qualities so essential to success—courage and self-reliance. He was a partisan, an active, working Republican, a Republican who believed sincerely in the principles and purposes of that great party. He worked with all his might for its supremacy. But his partisanship was never of a bitter type. Friendship overleaps party bounds, and JOHN SIMPKINS had many friends upon the other side of the House who had entire confidence in his integrity and sincerity of purpose.

Others who have been associated with him longer and more intimately than I have been have spoken of his services in this House. I can add little to what they have said, but I am glad to bear testimony to the fidelity with which he discharged his public duties. It can be said of him that he was a valuable public servant. At all times he worked energetically for his State and the people of his district. He looked closely after the interests of his constituents, endeavoring to render useful service to those who had given him his commission. They had trusted him. In return he tried to be their faithful representative, to be loyal to duty.

The bravest lives are those to duty wed,
Whose deeds, both great and small,
Are close-knit strands of an unbroken thread
Where love ennobles all.

In accord with an honored custom of this House, its members are gathered here to express by heartfelt tributes their appreciation of an able and devoted associate. To the members of the Massachusetts delegation he was more than that; he was their friend, a friend whom they loved and honored. He was taken away at a time when there was every assurance of continued success. But 36 years of age, his life thus far had been one of preparation for greater usefulness. That a life so rich in promise should have been thus cut short is a mystery we can not solve. He is gone from us, but he was so full of life I can not think of him as dead.

There are no dead; we fall asleep
To waken where they never weep.
We close our eyes on pain and sin,
Our breath ebbs out, but life flows in.

Mr. FISCHER. Mr. Speaker, I accept this opportunity to place on the record my appreciation of JOHN SIMPKINS, and my opinion of his worth.

There was no member of this House outside of those who represent my own State with whom I was so intimate as he, and because of that intimacy was enabled to observe most thoroughly. Our Congressional careers began simultaneously, and from the first there sprang up between us a friendship which not only endured, but which grew stronger with time.

This friendship formed, however, was of comparatively short duration, for on the 26th day of March, 1898, in the beginning of his second term, Providence took him from us to sleep with his fathers, and his relatives and friends were called upon to mourn over his sad departure.

JOHN SIMPKINS was a man of powerful frame, possessed a most vigorous manhood, and appeared to enjoy a most robust health. He was a man of great activity and seemed to have an untiring energy. One was compelled to admire his physical structure and wonder if it could not resist the storms that human flesh is heir to, but his rapid failure from the time of his affliction, taking him away in the very springtime of his life, fully answers such queries and reminds us of the uncertainties of our existence upon this earth.

JOHN SIMPKINS by his many sterling qualities, his affability, his kindliness of heart, and his readiness to at all times assist his friends endeared himself to all who knew him. His conduct while among us varied not a particle from that which he evinced in his home and in his district, both to his family and to his constituents. He was alike to all men. He knew no deceit, and he knew not how to do wrong. He was fair in his dealings, and the testimony of all who knew him was that he was an honest man.

He was always of a cheerful disposition, and everyone in his company was sure to be influenced by it.

JOHN SIMPKINS was honored by his constituents because as their Representative he honored them. He considered it not only his duty, but also his pleasure, to serve them. At all hours he was engaged in pushing their cause. He did not allow the rights of his people to be injured or taken from them, and his constant thought was to secure for them some benefit. No district was more faithfully represented and no constituency mourned the loss of its Representative more.

JOHN SIMPKINS was an ambitious man. He had a laudable desire to attain still higher honors, and he bent his energies in order that he might secure them; and the promise of their success seemed to him assuring.

Carried off thus early in his life, while surrounded by a host of friends, he is greatly mourned. His friends in this House, wishing to record their love and regard for him, join in these sad ceremonies to say their last farewell. His name will live with us forever.

Mr. KNOX. Mr. Speaker, it is almost impossible for me to add anything to the words of eulogy that have been so fittingly spoken to-day in reference to our dead colleague; yet I can not forbear to contribute a word to this general and deserved tribute to the memory of JOHN SIMPKINS, whose life was so suddenly cut short.

If it can ever be properly said of the death of a human being that that death was untimely, I think it may be said truthfully in the case of our late colleague. He was at the very threshold of his public career, a career for which, in the opinion of those who knew him best, he was in many respects exceedingly well qualified. He was liberally educated. He had been a faithful and, as I am informed, a somewhat hard-working student. He had not neglected the great opportunities which had come to him. He was endowed with abundant means. He was not, and would not have been, troubled with those cares and anxieties that often interfere with the public career of our best and ablest men. This public career he had chosen for himself. It was his desire, his ambition. He had intentionally fitted himself for it; he had sought it; and the people, recognizing his ambition and desire, had elected him to the high office of a Representative in this body.

Now, Mr. Speaker, if we could speak of what would have been if he had been spared, if we could speak here to-day of his career as we now conceive it might have proved, very much might be said. But little can be said of that career as it was, because it was so short. But he certainly brought to the career which he had chosen very many attributes exceedingly valuable to those who sent him here. As has been said by all, he was an industrious man. His time, apart from that spent in this House, was devoted to study and work designed to familiarize himself with the legislation proceeding here from day to day. He did not come here as an ornamental legislator. He came here for work; and he followed out faithfully his purpose to the end.

He was a man of very excellent judgment, as I think every one of his colleagues will agree. He was a practical man. Not troubling himself with the broader theories and wider scope of legislation, he looked at it in its practical relation to men and affairs—to the business of the country.

His excellent judgment and practical aptitude led to his being chosen unanimously by his associates as a representative of Massachusetts on the Congressional committee. Very much was expected and hoped from the service which he would be able to render his party and the country in that office. I know that during the consideration of the tariff bill, representing as he did a large manufacturing district of New England, he was exceedingly vigilant and anxious at every step in that legislation, zealously watching all that related to the interests of his constituents.

And, Mr. Speaker, in the debates on this floor that followed the enactment of this bill, resulting from the hard times and troubles in New England, when anything was said about his district, about the strike at New Bedford, or the trouble at Fall River, he was ever jealous of the reputation of the men who sent him here, caring not only for their local interests but for their character and standing before the rest of the country.

As I have stated, if we could speak of what he might have been, much might be said. Much more, Mr. Speaker, might be said if we should undertake to speak of all he was to us as a man, as a friend, as a kind and helpful associate, ready always to sacrifice his own ease and his own ambitions for the benefit of his associates.

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. To express satisfactorily one's feeling toward a deceased colleague on these formal occasions is always difficult; when he was one of your nearest and dearest friends it is impossible. I shall only allude to one or two features in the life and character of Mr. SIMPKINS which seem to me remarkable. Most of us who come to this House, most Americans who achieve distinction in any line of work, have from childhood been urged to effort and industry and application by the spur of necessity. Wealth with us has been so widely distributed and so little concentrated that it is almost a matter of course to assume that a successful man, after inheriting perhaps the means of education, has made his way by his own resources. Lafayette, wealthy nobleman as well as ardent patriot, when visiting this country in 1825, said that the first question most of his old companions in arms asked him was: "What do you do for a living?" To work for a living is the rule of American life, and doubtless largely to this is due the tremendous energy and prodigious results which have been evolved here in the century. The habits of work, formed in early life, continue when the first motive is removed, so that restless activity and industry are the characteristics of the successful as well as of the necessitous American.

So I think the prime, original cause of our industry is necessity. And if that motive force were withdrawn we should gradually sink into idleness and sloth. And when a man in early life sees his wants supplied by a kindly fortune without effort of his own, it marks uncommon strength of character and force of mind if, without the usual spur of necessity and acquisitiveness, he studies self-development, and instead of entire absorption in pleasure and self-gratification, applies his faculties to useful work for himself and for others.

Such was one of the distinctions of JOHN SIMPKINS. Born with a sufficient competency to make remunerative work unnecessary, he did not waste his talents in self-indulgence, but devoted himself industriously to their development. I would not intimate that he was an ascetic. All the pleasures of life he appreciated keenly and enjoyed to the full, but his strong sense and overruling judgment kept them subordinate, made them the incidents, not the ends of life. And in a State and a district where industry is honored and idleness is a reproach he was elected to Congress when only 33. To have convinced his constituents of his fitness at such an early age, and without the usual opportunities of professional or business display, proves an ability, character, and will power of extraordinary strength.

And when he came here he soon proved to his supporters the wisdom of their choice. In scrupulous attention to the work of his committees and the interests of his district I do not think he was surpassed by any member. He showed an extraordinary adaptation to legislative work. Even in debate, where he had no professional training and where his powers were comparatively untried, he displayed great proficiency; and in his first extended speech surprised even his expectant friends by his ease, his readiness, and his force. His complete mastery of the subject surprised no one who knew him. I think he would have developed into a strong and influential debater. But I think his most valuable quality was an inborn sagacity. His judgment was not easily disturbed or distorted, and he had that invaluable gift of seeing men and things in their true proportion and perspective, and knew instinctively how best to adapt means to a desired end. Death alone could prevent his taking a position of great influence.

But strong and able as he was, his heart was larger than his mind. He was the most delightful and generous and affectionate of friends. As we grow older and become more selfish, more suspicious, and more discreet, new friendships become more and more difficult. But JOHN SIMPKINS was one whose genial, sincere nature invited entire confidence. With him I felt no need to conceal what I might think were my weaknesses of character or intellect, any more than to parade what I thought was my strength. It is often a sympathy in the trifling and incidental matters of life, rather than in profound and serious concerns, which binds friendship fast. With some men we associate constantly, have similar intellectual tastes, the same views of life and duty, and yet the barriers which shut off real intimacy never fall down. I suppose it is because friendship is of the heart, not of the head, and the warm heart and disposition betray themselves in trifles more than in important or studied action. In small things, as in large, he was singularly sympathetic and kindly and considerate.

While full of spirit and entering with great zest into the pleasures as well as the work of life, he had an inherent thoughtfulness for others which was ever alert to see that they too were cheerful and that no one was ill at ease or neglected. He was generous and kindly to a fault. On Monday before he died, I remember walking home with him from the Capitol, as was our custom, and he stopped to send some flowers to a casual friend, of whose illness he had just heard. Such little kindnesses were his habit and his pleasure. On that day if I had been asked who in all this House had the fairest prospect for a long life, I think I should have selected him, as he stood among us a model of attractive, vigorous young manhood, singularly endowed with every gift that can make man happy or can make man useful. In five days he was gone, and it brings home to us again the terrible lesson which we are daily learning but ever forgetting—

What shadows we are, and what shadows we pursue.

Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. ADAMS] and the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. COUSINS] both desired to be present to-day, but are detained from the House because of illness, and ask permission to insert some remarks in the RECORD with reference to our dead comrade and friend.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. BERRY). The Chair hears no objection to the request of the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I move, as a further mark of respect to the memory of the deceased, that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and accordingly (at 3 o'clock and 33 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

ADMISSION TO WEST POINT MILITARY ACADEMY.

Mr. HAWLEY. I am directed by the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the joint resolution (S. R. 233) authorizing the admission of Andrés Ponte-Ruego, of Venezuela, to the Military Academy at West Point, to report it without amendment.

The joint resolution merely gives authority to the Republic of Venezuela to send a cadet to the West Point Military Academy. I beg leave to ask that it be acted upon immediately. It is a courtesy always granted without hesitation. All the expenses of the cadet are to be paid by his own country. A similar joint resolution, I am told, was passed by the House and came over here this morning.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the joint resolution? The Chair hears none.

Mr. HAWLEY. I would lay aside the Senate joint resolution and take up instead the House joint resolution, which is identical with it.

The joint resolution (H. Res. 344) granting authority to the Republic of Venezuela to send a cadet to West Point Military Academy was read the first time by its title and the second time at length, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized to permit Andrés Ponte-Ruego, of Venezuela, to receive instruction at the Military Academy at West Point: Provided, That no expense shall be caused to the United States thereby: And provided further, That in the case of the said Ponte-Ruego the provisions of sections 1320 and 1321 of the Revised Statutes shall be suspended.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the joint resolution?

There being no objection, the joint resolution was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. HAWLEY. The meaning of the last clause is that he shall be excused from taking the oath to support the Constitution of the United States.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. HAWLEY. I move that joint resolution (S. R. 233) authorizing the admission of Andrés Ponte-Ruego, of Venezuela, to the Military Academy at West Point be indefinitely postponed.

The motion was agreed to.

SAMUEL RACEY.

Mr. PASCO. I am directed by the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. 5168) for the relief of Samuel Racey, to report adversely thereon, and ask that it be indefinitely postponed. On Saturday I reported favorably from the same committee a House bill having the same purpose in view, and hence the Senate bill is no longer necessary. I move that the Senate bill be indefinitely postponed.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. ALLISON. I ask unanimous consent that the House bill, being the bill (H. R. 6718) for the relief of Samuel Racey, be considered at this time. It will take but a moment.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which had been reported from the Committee on Military Affairs with amendments.

The amendments were, in line 5, page 1, to strike out "Adjutant-General, United States Army" and insert "War Department;" and after the word "Infantry," in line 7, to strike out the following words:

And that a certificate of honorable discharge be issued to said soldier as of date September 29, 1864.

And in lieu thereof to insert:

And substitute therefor "absented himself without leave in January, 1864, and so remained absent to September 28, 1864, when he enlisted in the name of Samuel Rowling and was mustered into the service in such name on September 29, 1864, as a private in the Twenty-fifth Battery Indiana Light Artillery, and served faithfully to July 20, 1865, when he was honorably discharged under the name of Samuel Rowling," and correct the records of the Twenty-fifth Battery Indiana Light Artillery by adding after the name Rowling the words "alias Samuel Racey," and to issue to said Samuel Racey an honorable discharge as of date July 20, 1865, reciting his record in both said organizations.

So as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of War is hereby authorized and directed to remove the charge of desertion appearing on the records of the War Department against Samuel Racey, late private, Company K, Thirtieth Ohio Infantry, and substitute therefor "absented himself without leave in January, 1864, and so remained absent to September 28, 1864, when he enlisted in the name of Samuel Rowling and was mustered into the service in such name on September 29, 1864, as a private in the Twenty-fifth Battery Indiana Light Artillery, and served faithfully to July 20, 1865, when he was honorably discharged under the name of Samuel Rowling," and correct the records of the Twenty-fifth Battery Indiana Light Artillery by adding after the name Rowling the words "alias Samuel Racey," and to issue to said Samuel Racey an honorable discharge as of date July 20, 1865, reciting his record in both said organizations: Provided, That no pay, bounty, or other emoluments shall become due or payable by virtue of the passage of this act.

THE CALENDAR.

Mr. HOAR. Mr. President, I desire to ask the unanimous consent of the Senate for that which I think everybody will see the propriety of. In printing this paper, called the Calendar of Business, I understand it is the custom to print a list of the subjects on the table, the subjects on the regular Calendar, the status of appropriation bills, and notices which have been given for the future. But where a resolution is offered and it goes over either for one day, under the rule, or from day to day, by the consent of the Senate, no notice is taken of it. I desire that the Secretary be directed that where such a resolution is introduced and goes over under the rule or stands over from day to day, it be put with the list of like matters in a like position and also be printed on the Calendar. It will be very convenient to the Senate to know what is coming up each particular day in that way. I ask unanimous consent that resolutions which have gone over under the rule may be printed on the Calendar so far as to indicate their subjects.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request made by the Senator from Massachusetts? The Chair hears none, and the order is made.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The resolution must be referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate.

Mr. GEAR. It embraces the expenses of a stenographer for only one day.

It directs the Secretary of War to so amend the records of the War Department as to remove the charge of mutiny, disobedience and defiance of orders, and conduct unbecoming an officer and a gentleman from the record of George W. avenue within thirty days from the passage of this act, and the proceedings for such condemnation shall be under and according to the provisions of sections 257 to 267 of the Revised Statutes of the United States relating to the District of Columbia, which provide for the condemnation of lands in said District for public highways.

"SEC. 2. That payment of the sum or sums of money adjudged to be due and payable for lands taken under the provisions of this act shall be made by the Treasurer of the United States, ex officio commissioner of the sinking fund of the District of Columbia, upon the warrant of the said Commissioners, out of the revenues of the District of Columbia; and a sufficient sum to pay such judgments and awards is hereby appropriated out of the revenues of the District.

"SEC. 4. H. C. HANSBROUGH,
JAMES MCMILLAN,
THOMAS S. MARTIN,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

G. M. CURTIS,
W. S. COWHERD,
Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. COCKRELL. What is the effect of that conference report? I should like to have the chairman of the Committee on the District of Columbia explain it.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from North Dakota [Mr. HANSBROUGH] submitted the report.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. The bill as it passed the Senate appropriated in section 2, to pay the awards of such condemnation, $75,000, or so much of said sum as may be necessary. The House amended it so as to provide that the expenses of such condemnation shall not exceed $1,000, one half of the expenses to be paid by the property owners who are benefited and the other half by the District.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the report.

The report was agreed to.

HEALTH OF SOLDIERS IN THE PHILIPPINE ISLANDS.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate the resolution submitted by the Senator from Illinois [Mr. MASON], coming over from a previous day.

Mr. MASON. I will state that I have modified my resolution in conformity with the suggestion made by the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. ALDRICH], and it meets the objection on the part of the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. HAWLEY].

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The resolution as modified will be read.

The Secretary read the resolution as modified, as follows:

Whereas a large number of the sailors and soldiers of the United States are now in the Philippine Islands, or on their way there; and

Whereas there are differing newspaper reports as to the condition of the health of the soldiers and sailors; and

Whereas it is reported by the press that there is a large percentage of those who are made sick by reason of the climate of the said islands; and

Whereas it is stated upon good medical authority that during the late years as high as 50 per cent of the soldiers unaccustomed to that climate have died by reason of the said climate: Therefore, be it

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be directed to furnish for the information of the Senate a statement as to the percentage of our soldiers who are sick and have been sick, and the number of deaths in our Army by reason of the sickness caused by the climate in said islands, and to set forth when, according to the generally accepted term, the sickly season begins in said islands.

Mr. MASON. I merely ask for the information from the Secretary of War, and not from the Surgeon-General.

Mr. HAWLEY. I confess I do not see the usefulness of the inquiry. The reports may be exaggerated. I do not believe any such stories as that 50 per cent of the soldiers have been sick. I think the Senator could get his information at the Surgeon-General's Office by private inquiry, but I will not make a formal objection, though I have no respect for the resolution.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the resolution as modified.

The resolution as modified was agreed to.

INDIAN DEPREDATION CLAIMS.

Mr. PETTIGREW. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 5206) to declare the proper construction of the act of March 3, 1891, entitled "An act to provide for the adjudication and payment of claims arising from Indian depredations."

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It provides that in the construction of the act of Congress approved March 3, 1891, entitled "An act to provide for the adjudication and payment of claims arising from Indian depredations," the condition of amity existing in the year 1890 between the United States and the Sioux and Cheyenne nations of Indians, and the several bands and tribes thereof, shall not be considered to have been interrupted or destroyed by any disturbance occurring in the latter part of the year 1890 and the early part of the year 1891, but the said nations and all the bands and tribes thereof shall be deemed and considered as continuously in amity during those two years.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

WIDENING OF NINETEENTH STREET.

Mr. GALLINGER. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 11605) for the widening of Nineteenth street NW.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which had been reported from the Committee on the District of Columbia with an amendment, in section 4, line 11, page 3, after the word "highway," to insert:

When the use of a part only of any piece or parcel of ground shall be condemned, the jury, in determining its value, shall not take into consideration any benefits that may accrue to the remainder thereof from the opening of said avenue, but such benefits shall be considered in determining what assessment shall be made on or against that part of such lot as is not taken, as is hereinbefore provided.

So as to make the section read:

SEC. 4. That the sums to be assessed against each lot and piece and parcel of ground shall be determined and designated by the jury, and in determining what amount shall be assessed against any particular piece or parcel of ground the jury shall take into consideration the situation of said lots and the benefits that they may severally receive from the widening of said street and highway. When the use of a part only of any piece or parcel of ground shall be condemned, the jury, in determining its value, shall not take into consideration any benefits that may accrue to the remainder thereof from the opening of said avenue, but such benefits shall be considered in determining what assessment shall be made on or against that part of such lot as is not taken, as is hereinbefore provided.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

Mr. GALLINGER. I ask now that the further consideration of the bill may be postponed, so that it may remain as it is, as I recall the fact that the Senator from Montana [Mr. CARTER] may possibly desire to offer an amendment to it.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will go over.

Mr. GALLINGER subsequently said: A few minutes ago House bill 11605 was under consideration. It was considered as in Committee of the Whole and was reported to the Senate. At my suggestion, supposing the Senator from Montana might want to amend it, the bill was laid over. The Senator does not care to move an amendment, and I ask that the bill may be passed.

The amendment was ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

SOUTHERN JUDICIAL DISTRICT OF MISSISSIPPI.

Mr. ALLISON. I ask unanimous consent that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the Indian appropriation bill.

Mr. PETTUS. By the courtesy of the Senator from Iowa, I wish to make a report. The Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the bill (S. 5376) authorizing the terms of the district court of the United States for the southern district of Mississippi to be held hereafter at Biloxi, direct me to report it favorably without amendment; and by the instructions of the same committee I ask that the bill may be now considered and put on its passage.

Mr. ALLISON. I yield to the Senator from Alabama, provided that no time is consumed beyond the reading of the bill.

Mr. PETTUS. I think the bill will occasion no debate.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

INDIAN APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. ALLISON. I now ask unanimous consent that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the Indian appropriation bill.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 11217) making appropriations for the current and contingent expenses of the Indian Department and for fulfilling treaty stipulations with various Indian tribes for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1900, and for other purposes.

Mr. QUAY. I desire to call the attention of the Senator from Iowa in charge of the pending bill to the clause on page 34, from line 10 to line 16, inclusive, which is an appropriation for the subsistence and civilization of the Arapahoes and Cheyennes on the reservations set apart for them.

I desire to offer as a substitute for that clause an amendment which is recommended by the Indian Department.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. There was so much noise in the Chamber that I did not understand what was the motion of the Senator from Iowa, nor do I understand what the Senate is now doing.

Mr. ALLISON. I asked unanimous consent that the Senate should proceed to the consideration of the Indian appropriation bill, which was granted, and we now have that bill under consideration.

POLICY REGARDING PHILIPPINE ISLANDS.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. Mr. President, I should like to interrupt the proceedings long enough to say that when the agreement was made some time since to take a vote on the pending treaty, I thought the understanding was that the joint resolution which had been introduced by the Senator from Georgia [Mr. BACON] and the resolutions introduced by other Senators might be considered within the time that was left. I did not understand that the intention of the Committee on Appropriations was to take up the time after the routine morning business every morning until 2 o'clock with appropriation bills, to the exclusion of those matters which are collateral to and connected with the treaty.

The Senator from Georgia gave notice some days ago that on Saturday last he would ask to have his resolutions taken up for action on that day. We understood that was to be done. The newspapers give out, of course, that these resolutions will not be considered; that the majority will not permit them to be considered. I hope that is not the case. There are a number of us who would like to have votes on these resolutions, and for one I think there should be time enough given to allow votes on these questions if the Senate is unwilling to allow a discussion of them.

Mr. ALLISON. Mr. President, I have no intention to interfere with proper and legitimate discussion or with proper action on any matter connected with or incidental to the pending treaty. I inquired at the Secretary's desk this morning to ascertain whether any Senator desired to speak during the morning hour on any of these resolutions, and I found that there was no memorandum there upon that subject. Therefore I felt at liberty to ask the Senate to take up the Indian appropriation bill.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. I was not complaining that there was no opportunity allowed for a speech; but what I did think, and what I think now, is that the Senate should allow time for the consideration of the resolution of the Senator from Georgia as well as other resolutions; and if it suits that Senator and other Senators, I am willing now to take a vote on that resolution, and would be glad to have it done before we proceed with the consideration of the Indian appropriation bill.

Mr. BACON. If the Senator from Iowa will permit me, in explanation of what the Senator from Arkansas has said, I wish to say that I gave notice several days ago that on Saturday last I should ask the Senate to take up the joint resolution introduced by me. I well recognize, of course, that I gained no advantage by that notice; but the object I had in giving that notice was that Senators might be informed of the purpose.

The Senator will remember that on Saturday, when the time came for the making of that motion, the Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE] interposed a motion for the taking up of an appropriation bill, and now again this morning, when an opportunity might be offered for the making of the motion, another appropriation bill is interposed. The result will be that whereas we have given consent for the taking of the vote on the treaty next Monday, these collateral matters, which are not only connected with that particular action intended by the Senate, but which will necessarily affect the votes of Senators, whether they will vote one way or another—these resolutions will be entirely displaced and no action will be taken upon them.

Mr. ALLISON. Mr. President, as I understand, there is no purpose on either side of the Chamber to interfere with the proper discussion of the resolutions which have been referred to. There are, I think, four or five of them on the table. The Senator from Connecticut [Mr. PLATT] gave public notice a day or two since that before any vote was taken upon any of the resolutions he desired an opportunity to debate them, and other Senators about me I know desire the same opportunity. Therefore it seems to me that it will be impossible to take a vote upon any one of these resolutions so long as this important debate is going on.

I do not wish to interfere in any way with the complete execution of the understanding which was had some days ago respecting the treaty and matters incident to it.

Mr. GALLINGER. If the Senator will permit me, there are now on the Calendar notices of six speeches on these resolutions.

Mr. ALLISON. I had not observed that.

So, I think it will be manifestly impossible for us to secure a vote upon the resolutions at this time. If any Senator now desires to discuss them or any one of them, I will not this morning press the Indian appropriation bill; but if the discussion is not to go on, I feel that I am justified in asking that we proceed with the Indian appropriation bill.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, if Senators can postpone the consideration of matters by simply saying that they desire to discuss those matters, and at the same time make no effort to discuss them, of course that is a very simple way of preventing any action on the part of the Senate.

As I understand, no notice has been given to discuss the particular joint resolution which I have introduced, and the particular resolutions which I have introduced can be acted upon by the Senate without preventing any discussion as to other resolutions.

Mr. ALLISON. But the Senator will see that these resolutions are all practically to the same tenor and effect. At least I understand them to be so. Whilst, for example, the joint resolution of the Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST] has been taken up and debate has been had upon it, yet the debate has gone to the whole question involved in each and all of the resolutions. I will say to the Senator that in looking over the notices which are printed on our Calendar, I find that for to-morrow the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. BERRY] has given notice that after the routine morning business he will submit some remarks on Senate joint resolution 191, which, I suppose, is the resolution of the Senator from Missouri, as most of the speeches have been based upon that resolution, it being the first one offered.

Next, I find that the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. SPOONER] has given notice that on Wednesday, February 1, after the routine morning business, he desires to offer some observations on Senate joint resolution 191. I think it will be impossible for the Senator from Arkansas or the Senator from Wisconsin to make observations upon this general question without debating the resolution of the Senator from Georgia [Mr. BACON].

For the next day, Thursday, February 2, I find that the Senator from Utah [Mr. RAWLINS] has given notice that he will submit some remarks on Senate joint resolution 191; the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. MONEY] has given notice that he will speak on Friday, February 3; the Senator from Texas [Mr. CHILTON] has given notice that he will speak on Saturday, February 4; and the junior Senator from Illinois [Mr. MASON] has given notice that he will also speak on Friday.

So, finding that there was no engagement for a speech this morning, I asked the Senate to consider the Indian appropriation bill. Now, if there is any Senator or if there are Senators who desire to debate any one of these resolutions, I am perfectly willing to give way.

Mr. DANIEL. Will the Senator permit me a moment?

Mr. ALLISON. Yes, sir.

Mr. DANIEL. If I had known that to-day would be unoccupied, I should have requested that I be permitted to submit a few remarks on the subject of the resolutions referred to. Finding that all the days of this week have been appropriated by Senators, I do not see any day before Monday next on which I can secure an opportunity to address the Senate.

Mr. ALLISON. The Senator will observe that after to-day every day is to be occupied in debate on the resolutions which are pending on this subject.

Mr. DANIEL. With the permission of the Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON], I desire to give notice, Mr. President, that on Monday next I should like to make some remarks on the joint resolution introduced by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST], as I do not see any day on which I can have such an opportunity before that time.

Mr. COCKRELL. Monday is the day for voting on the treaty, is it not?

Mr. ALLISON. Monday next at 3 o'clock.

Mr. HOAR. I hope the Senator will give his notice for some convenient day this week, following some other Senator who has already given notice of an intention to speak.

Mr. DANIEL. I shall say Friday of this week then, or Monday, unless I have an earlier opportunity.

Mr. ALLISON. Say Saturday.

Mr. DANIEL. I shall be willing to proceed on Friday or Saturday, if an opportunity presents.

Mr. CHANDLER. Mr. President——

Mr. HOAR. Allow me one moment in reference to this matter. The Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON] inadvertently stated that the Senator from Illinois [Mr. MASON] had given notice of a purpose to address the Senate on Friday next. The Senator from Illinois gave no notice of any purpose to address the Senate, but only that he would call for a vote on his resolution on Friday.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. That notice was for last Friday.

Mr. COCKRELL. That notice was for January 27.

Mr. ALLISON. Then I modify my statement. The Senator from Illinois, I take it, will make some observations before the vote on his resolution.

Mr. DANIEL. I will then state that on Friday next I shall address the Senate.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. I wish to call the attention of the Senator from Iowa particularly to the fact that every single notice to which he has referred has been a notice that the Senator would discuss Senate joint resolution 191, which is the resolution introduced by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST]. There is no notice given of the discussion of the joint resolution of the Senator from Georgia [Mr. BACON]. There is nothing interposed between that proposition and a vote; no Senator has expressed any desire to speak on that; and unless there is a determination simply to avoid a vote on the resolution of the Senator from Georgia, there is no reason why the resolution can not now be taken up and voted on.

Mr. ALLISON. One word, Mr. President. The Senator from Arkansas says that the notices to which I have referred have been notices of speeches upon the joint resolution of the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. So they have been.

Mr. ALLISON. Whilst that is technically true, we all know that the resolution of the Senator from Georgia, the resolution of the Senator from Missouri, and other resolutions are practically addressed to the same question and decide practically the same point. The Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. SPOONER], when he gave his notice, stated that he wished on next Wednesday to discuss joint resolution 191 and all kindred resolutions upon the same subject.

I submit that it has not been usual to press a vote on any particular matter when it is under debate in this Chamber. Therefore, as I supposed, seeing no probability of or opportunity for a discussion of the resolutions this morning, because they involve one question and are all incident to the treaty, I called up the Indian appropriation bill. Now, if there is any disposition to debate the resolutions, I shall withdraw at once any proposition.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. Let us have a vote.

Mr. ALLISON. Very well; but the Senator knows that there are Senators on this floor who desire to discuss the resolutions who are not ready to vote, and that there will be no vote this morning. Did not the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. PLATT], who can speak for himself, give notice that he did not desire to vote upon this question until he had an opportunity to debate it in this Chamber? I do not know, but he may have abandoned that idea.

If the Senator from Arkansas will ask unanimous consent to vote now on the resolution of the Senator from Georgia, I will yield for that purpose and see whether we can have it.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, we, of course, understand the general rule of courtesy which prevails in this body, that each Senator, if he so desires, shall be allowed to express himself upon a measure before a vote is taken upon it. At the same time, it must be manifest that when a resolution which is pending must, in order that it may be effective, be voted upon before a certain time, it is certainly a stretch of that rule to claim that such a resolution shall not be voted upon before that time in order that Senators may have an opportunity so to express themselves.

Mr. President, these resolutions are designed to affect the action of Senators in voting upon the treaty next Monday; in other words, the design of the introduction of these resolutions was that there might be an expression by the lawmaking power before the time arrived when Senators would be called upon to vote upon the treaty. If by giving notice at a late day of an intention to speak the purpose can be defeated, then I say it is a stretch of that rule.

Now, what are the facts? These resolutions were introduced here on the 11th day of January, nearly three weeks ago. Senators have had ample opportunity since that date not only to make up their minds as to the position they desire to occupy or intend to occupy, but also to express themselves to the Senate, in order that, if possible, they might influence the views of others.

What, I repeat, is the purpose of these resolutions? I desire to call the attention of the Senator from Iowa to the fact that these resolutions in one particular differ from the other resolutions which are upon the table and which are being called up for discussion from time to time.

The resolution introduced by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST] is the declaration of an abstract principle, a declaration as to the power of the Government for the acquisition of territory for the purposes of colonization. The resolution offered by the Senator from Illinois [Mr. MASON] is also an abstract declaration as to the power of this Government to impose a government upon an unwilling people. The resolutions I have introduced, however, go to the root of the practical question, If this treaty is ratified, what is the purpose of the Government with reference to the Philippine Islands? There are those who will support that treaty if that purpose is in accord with what we deem to be the fundamental principles of this Government. There are those of us who can not vote for the treaty unless there is such an authoritative declaration on the part of the lawmaking power.

Mr. ALLISON. Mr. President——

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, the point I am coming to, if the Senator from Iowa will pardon me a moment, is this: In order that the resolutions which I have introduced may be of any effect, if passed, they must go through this body, go to the other House, and go to the President, and the matter be concluded before the date for voting on the treaty arrives. With three weeks intervening since their introduction, with ample opportunity for every Senator to examine the matter and to express himself, I submit that it is not in accord with the spirit of the rule of courtesy that the consideration of the resolutions and action thereon by this body should be postponed to a date when such postponement would utterly defeat the purposes of the resolutions.

The Senator from Iowa suggests that all these notices of speeches by Senators have been given and that therefore the Senate should not take up these resolutions for consideration.

Mr. ALLISON. No; the Senator does not understand me. I say that if it is the purpose of the Senate, or the wish of Senators, to take up these resolutions, I shall give way.

Mr. BACON. Very well. Then, Mr. President, in order that we may ascertain what is the wish of the Senate in the matter, I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate joint resolution 211.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair understands that, with the assent of the Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON], the Indian appropriation bill is temporarily laid aside for the purpose of the motion of the Senator from Georgia [Mr. BACON], to wit, that the Senate shall now proceed to consider Order of Business No. 20, Senate joint resolution 211, relative to the acquisition of foreign territory.

Mr. ALLISON. No formal vote is necessary, Mr. President. I understand the Senator wishes to ask that the subject be voted on; and if he desires that, I shall give way in order that that may be done.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair hears no objection to the motion of the Senator from Georgia.

Mr. BACON. I move that the joint resolution be taken up.

Mr. ALLISON. There is no objection to taking up the joint resolution.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the joint resolution (S. R. 211) relative to the acquisition of foreign territory.

Mr. GALLINGER. Let the joint resolution be read in full, Mr. President.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The joint resolution will be read at length.

The Secretary read the joint resolution, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, First. That the Government and people of the United States have not waged the recent war with Spain for conquest and for the acquisition of foreign territory, but solely for the purposes set forth in the resolution of Congress making the declaration of said war, the acquisition of such small tracts of land or harbors as may be necessary for governmental purposes being not deemed inconsistent with the same.

Second. That in demanding and in receiving the cession of the Philippine Islands it is not the purpose of the Government of the United States to secure and maintain dominion over the same as a part of the territory of the United States, or to incorporate the inhabitants thereof as citizens of the United States, or to hold said inhabitants as vassals or subjects of this Government.

Third. That whereas at the time of the declaration of war by the United States against Spain, and prior thereto, the inhabitants of the Philippine Islands were actively engaged in a war with Spain to achieve their independence, and whereas said purpose and the military operations thereunder have not been abandoned, but are still being actively prosecuted thereunder, therefore, in recognition of and in obedience to the vital principle announced in the great declaration that governments derive "their just powers from the consent of the governed," the Government of the United States recognizes that the people of the Philippine Islands of a right ought to be free and independent; that, with this view and to give effect to the same, the Government of the United States has required the Government of Spain to relinquish its authority and government in the Philippine Islands and to withdraw its land and naval forces from the Philippine Islands and from the waters thereof.

Fourth. That the United States hereby disclaim any disposition or intention to exercise sovereignty, jurisdiction, or control over said islands, and assert their determination, when a stable and independent government shall have been duly erected therein entitled to recognition as such, to transfer to said government, upon terms which shall be reasonable and just, all rights secured under the cession by Spain, and to thereupon leave the government and control of the islands to their people.

Mr. CHANDLER. Mr. President, I move that the resolutions be referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. BACON. I trust that that motion will not prevail. This is a matter which requires that we shall take immediate action, or the contrary will result in the practical defeat of the joint resolution. Therefore when the Senator from New Hampshire moves to refer the resolutions to the Committee on Foreign Relations, it is an indisputable conclusion that whether the purpose is such or not, the effect of it will be to defeat the resolutions. Therefore those of us who favor the resolutions must vote in the negative; and upon the motion of the Senator from New Hampshire I call for the yeas and nays.

Mr. TELLER. I will inquire whether the motion includes all the resolutions?

Mr. CHANDLER. All the resolutions of the Senator from Georgia.

Mr. TELLER. There are several resolutions before the Senate on the same subject. It seems to me, if the Senator from New Hampshire suggests that the resolution introduced by the Senator from Georgia should be referred to the committee, all the other resolutions ought to go there. I think myself it would be eminently proper to send them there if we could have the assurance of the committee that they would promptly report something back. I should not like to see them go there and be smothered, and I do not care to vote to refer one resolution when there are other resolutions that ought to go there if this one is referred.

Mr. CHANDLER. Mr. President, the resolutions of the Senator from Georgia are the only resolutions now before the Senate. Of course we can not deal with all the resolutions at once. The resolutions of the Senator from Georgia are put in the form of a joint resolution and, as he well says, must be acted upon by the House of Representatives to have any validity. Now, I am free to say that I do not believe the resolutions can be acted upon in the House, even if they are acted upon in the Senate, before next Monday. I think it reasonable, Mr. President, that there should be a vote upon the disposition of the resolutions of the Senator from Georgia before next Monday.

I have no desire to prevent a vote of the Senate upon the resolutions, on the question of referring them, or on the question of adopting them before next Monday. I think it reasonable that on Friday or Saturday the sense of the Senate should be taken as to whether it will take any prior action before voting upon the treaty. I think it reasonable that such a vote should be allowed, because, as the Senator from Georgia has well said, a unanimous-consent agreement has been made for Monday, and no Senator feels at liberty to violate such an agreement. No such agreement ever has been violated, either for light cause or for weighty cause, that I know of. That agreement having been made, if there are Senators who want votes upon these various resolutions before that time, I think there should be unanimous consent to take such votes, say on Friday.

Mr. TELLER. Say Saturday.

Mr. CHANDLER. Saturday. I wish to say to the Senator from Colorado that the only way the Senate can deal with these various resolutions is one after another. It can refer one resolution and adopt another. It can lay upon the table one resolution and adopt some one of the resolutions if the Senate desires to do that thing.

My own judgment, Mr. President, is very much averse to having any declaration of the Senate made before next Monday. I think we should take the action we are to take next Monday without any declaration of the policy of the United States, and I hope to speak briefly on that subject before a vote is taken. But if the Senator from Georgia asks that a vote be taken on Friday or Saturday—either day—I shall not object to it. I prefer to vote to refer the resolutions, because I think they come up very naturally and very properly after the vote of next Monday. I do feel that we ought not to take any action on any of these resolutions before that time.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, although the Senator from New Hampshire makes other suggestions, I understand the motion is still pending for the reference of the resolutions to the Committee on Foreign Relations. The Senator from New Hampshire suggests that it will be an impossibility to get the resolutions acted upon by the House by next Monday. If there is difficulty of that kind, and of course we all recognize it, that fact emphasizes the importance of prompt action by the Senate, and the futility of acting after it will be impracticable to make our action of any avail by reason of the want of time for the House also to act.

If in good faith the Senator from New Hampshire says that we ought to vote on these resolutions, then good faith requires that we should vote upon them at such time that if the Senate should agree to the resolutions the House would also have the opportunity to agree to them, and to postpone the vote until such time that even if the Senate should agree to the resolutions the House would not have the opportunity to agree to them is not acting in the good faith to which the Senator from New Hampshire alludes and which he recognizes.

Mr. CHANDLER. I shall not personally object to a vote to-day. I understand what the Senator wishes to accomplish, and I think it is a fair purpose which he has in view. I have stated my views very clearly. I shall not object to a vote to-day upon the Senator's resolutions, but I do wish to have them referred, because we ought to have the opinion of the Committee on Foreign Relations upon all these subjects, and we ought not to adopt any of the resolutions before we do the work which has been set for next Monday.

Mr. BACON. I suppose there can be no doubt that every Senator in this Chamber knows how he is going to vote on the resolutions. On the motion of the Senator from New Hampshire to refer the joint resolution to the Committee on Foreign Relations I ask for the yeas and nays.

Mr. CARTER. Mr. President, the statement by the Senator from Georgia [Mr. BACON] that there is a possible lack of good faith in reference to the contemplated vote or contemplated disposition to prevent a vote on the resolution here presented challenges my attention.

Mr. BACON. I beg the Senator's pardon before he proceeds. I could not hear him distinctly on account of the confusion in the Hall. Did I correctly understand the Senator to say that I said that there was a lack of good faith?

Mr. CARTER. That was my impression from the Senator's remarks.

Mr. BACON. The Senator misunderstood me. I said, practically, that the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. CHANDLER] had said that as we had given unanimous consent to vote upon the treaty he thought it was fair and right that we should have a vote on the cognate resolutions; and I said that implied a statement on the part of the Senator from New Hampshire that good faith required that it should be done within a time which would make the vote upon the resolutions effective. I did not make the statement in the shape the Senator puts it.

Mr. CARTER. I am glad to have the explanation of the Senator, because I think it puts him where his judgment would naturally dictate.

Mr. President, I take direct issue with the proposition that public interest, sound public policy, or any aspect of the existing situation requires or justifies a vote on any of these resolutions at this session of Congress. We have here presented a series of resolutions. That of the Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST] brings up a question of constitutional limitation upon the power of the Federal Government to do or not to do certain things set forth in the resolution. It is neither useful nor is it at present necessary for the Senate of the United States or the Congress of the country, if you please, to indulge in constitutional interpretations. The theory of the Senator from Missouri was evidently present in the mind of every Senator who prepared a resolution touching this general question. The theory of those who seek a vote on these resolutions is that before peace can be concluded with the Kingdom of Spain under the terms of the pending treaty the United States Senate must vote a want of confidence in the judgment, the discretion, the honor, and the integrity of the American people.

It is apprehended by those who seek the present consideration of these resolutions that a Congress to assemble hereafter to deal with the territorial acquisitions that may fall to us under and by virtue of the treaty under consideration may depart from the traditions of our country, the traditions of our race, the letter and spirit of our written Constitution, and launch the people of the United States upon a wild and shoreless sea of universal expansion, attended with tyranny and oppression wherever the flag may go. Mr. President, if such disposition should unhappily be developed in this country, written constitutions will not long restrain it, and resolutions of Congress or of either branch will be but as ropes of sand to stay the mighty tide.

The treaty under consideration requires no interpretation of the purpose of the Government of the United States or the people with reference to the future of the Philippine Islands. Our forefathers were compelled to meet the question of the future disposition of populations at the time of the ratification of the treaty of 1803, whereby Louisiana was ceded to the United States. By an article in that treaty it was expressly provided that the people of the territory annexed should ultimately become entitled to and participate in all the privileges, benefits, and rights of American citizens.

The same is true in reference to a clause in the treaty of cession by Mexico, adopted in 1848. By Article IX of that treaty it was provided that any citizen of the Republic of Mexico residing within the territory ceded might within the period of one year elect to retain his citizenship in the Republic of Mexico or become a citizen of the United States. After the lapse of the year, according to the terms of the treaty, the individuals residing within the ceded territory, now known as New Mexico, Arizona, and California, became entitled to full participation in and enjoyment of the rights and privileges of citizens of the United States. In the pending treaty no such provision occurs. Under its terms the mere sovereignty of Spain is ceded to the Republic of the United States. There is no promise in the treaty to Spain, there is no obligation existing to any power whatever to dispose of the Philippine territory or the people residing therein save and except as the enlightened judgment and acute conscience of the people of the United States may in the future direct.

Mr. President, the people of this country will be as good a class of people twelve months hence as they are to-day, and according to our general theories of progression they may be a better class of people. The Congress of the country will probably be as safe a body, all things considered, as the present Congress. By what right or authority, for what useful purpose, is this Congress now sitting, soon to expire, to undertake to tie the arms of the Government or to mortgage the privileges of the future, to undertake to limit the sphere of usefulness or the field of legitimate action for a Congress that is to follow? There is nothing in this treaty that requires it. By virtue of the ratification of the treaty the Government of the United States will be left without restraint of any kind, character, or description with reference to the Philippine Islands and the people who inhabit that archipelago. For what needful purpose, then, Mr. President, does the present Congress insist upon the determination of a policy to be pursued in those islands?

It must be conceded by those who seek to determine the momentous questions presented by the resolutions, not questions of constitutionality, but questions of policy, that our information is of the most meager character. I am in perfect sympathy and accord with the reported purpose of the President of the United States to take ample time to consider what is wise and prudent and patriotic and honest to do with reference to these new possessions. Even the number of islands in the archipelago seems to be a matter of controversy and doubt. The number of dialects or languages spoken by the people is merely conjectural, so far as our information at present extends. The number who speak the Spanish language, the number of inhabitants upon the islands who are Germans, English, Americans, Chinese, Japanese, or belong to the various other nationalities represented there we know only through vague and indefinite rumor.

Mr. President, the utility of that country for purposes of trade and commerce, looked at from the American point of view, can not be determined on the data at present before us. It seems to me that all the aspects of the case, the facts, the figures, and the statistics with reference to population and industry, to arable land, to mineral productions and possible productions, might with perfect propriety be sought before we determine just what we intend to do with that territory.

The Senator from Georgia and those who sympathize with his views in the Senate upon the resolutions contemplate disposition of the questions upon partial consideration. I would agree with him that something ought to be said by the Senate of the United States at this time and before the ratification of the treaty if the ratification of the treaty in any manner committed the Government of the United States for the future in that country.

Mr. MASON. Would I interrupt the Senator from Montana if I asked him a question?

Mr. CARTER. Not at all.

Mr. MASON. Do we not, in the ratification of the treaty, enter into an agreement with Spain to give her certain trade rights there for the next ten years?

Mr. CARTER. Only such trade rights as we ourselves may enjoy.

Mr. MASON. As we ourselves have.

Mr. CARTER. Yes.

Mr. MASON. But that does commit us to a certain policy so far as trade is concerned.

Mr. CARTER. So far as we may enjoy privileges of trade in the islands, for the next ten years we are to allow Spain similar rights and privileges. That is a mere matter of contract relation. Should we cede the sovereignty to some other power it would be subject to that particular provision.

Mr. CHANDLER. Mr. President——

Mr. MASON. Pardon me. From that statement I judge the Senator from Montana to say that under the treaty we take the sovereignty of the Philippine Islands.

Mr. CARTER. The sovereignty of Spain over the Philippine Islands is relinquished.

Mr. MASON. Do we take it?

Mr. CARTER. I understand it will not be in the air.

Mr. MASON. Still the Senator does not answer my question. I do not wish to interrupt him or to annoy him. Do we take the sovereignty of the Philippine Islands?

Mr. CARTER. I understand the fact to be that the United States will exercise control over the Philippine Islands to such full extent as Spain has exercised control over the islands.

Mr. MASON. Then we do by treaty announce a policy?

Mr. CARTER. We put ourselves in position by this treaty to do whatsoever we may in the future determine proper and wise and patriotic to do for our own interest and the interest of the inhabitants of the islands.

Mr. CHANDLER. Right here I ask the Senator from Montana to allow me to call his attention to the fact that the President, in the only proclamation he has made with reference to the policy which he intends to pursue, expressly states that it is only until Congress shall determine what shall be done with the islands. It is expressly so stated in his proclamation.

Mr. CARTER. Certainly. One of the misfortunes connected with these resolutions is that through them no attempt is made by Congress in any manner to dispose of the islands. This is a voluntary, uncalled-for, premature tying of the hands of this Government, and a limitation upon its right and privilege in the future to do the best thing that may be done for those people and for the benefit of this country at large.

Mr. BACON and Mr. TELLER addressed the Chair.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. CARTER. Certainly.

Mr. BACON. I simply desire to state, in order that I may not interrupt the Senator from Colorado in what he wishes to say, that there is no purpose in these resolutions and no effect in them to commit this Government to anything with reference to the future disposition and control of the Philippine Islands except that this Government will not itself exercise permanent dominion and sovereignty in the islands. So far as concerns arranging for their protection in the future, so far as concerns arranging for the establishment of an independent stable government, so far as concerns, by arrangement with other nations, guaranteeing that independence to them, there is nothing in the resolutions which will interfere with any such action on the part of the Government. The sole purpose and the only vital element in the joint resolution is the declaration that this Government does not intend to exercise permanent sovereignty in those islands.

Mr. TELLER. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. BACON. Certainly.

Mr. TELLER. I should like to ask the Senator from Georgia if there is anything in the joint resolution, according to his notion, that would prevent the Government of the United States from guaranteeing the independence of those islands alone, acting as a sort of protector over them?

Mr. BACON. Without committing myself to that as a policy which I would support, I think that the resolutions are certainly broad enough to allow the Government to take that position if it desires to do so, or, I think, to take any other position with reference to the islands short of the exercise of permanent dominion and sovereignty.

Mr. TELLER. Would it interrupt the Senator from Montana if I should make a suggestion?

Mr. CARTER. Certainly not.

Mr. TELLER. In conversation with the Senator who introduced the joint resolution, I suggested to him that we must exercise some dominion there for a time anyway, until we can get those people started, and he said he has no objection to inserting on the first page, in line 12, after the word "maintain," the word "permanent," so as to declare that "it is not the purpose of the Government of the United States to secure and maintain permanent dominion." If the Senator from Georgia does not object to that amendment, and the Senator from Montana will give me leave, I will move it now, so that we may know what the joint resolution means.

Mr. BACON. In what paragraph?

Mr. TELLER. In the second paragraph, to put the word "permanent" before "dominion," in line 12.

Mr. BACON. So far as I am authorized to do so by the rules of the Senate, I will accept that as an amendment.

Mr. GRAY. Ought not, for consistency's sake, the same amendment to be made in the fourth paragraph, line 21?

Mr. TELLER. I was going to make that suggestion as to the fourth section, line 21, page 2. There should be inserted, before the word "sovereignty," the word "permanent," showing that we must exercise some temporary power. If the Senator accepts that amendment, he has a right to have it incorporated in the joint resolution.

Mr. BACON. That is the spirit of the joint resolution. I have no objection to the amendment suggested by the Senator from Colorado in line 21, on page 2.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the amendment is agreed to. The Senator from Montana will proceed.

Mr. TELLER. I wish to ask for a reprint of the joint resolution. I understand that the print is out.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there any objection to the request made by the Senator from Colorado that the joint resolution be reprinted as modified?

Mr. BACON. Before that is done, I will call attention to the fact that there had previously been an amendment adopted by the insertion of the words "a stable and" in line 23, on page 2, so as to read "when a stable and independent government shall have been erected therein." That amendment has been previously adopted, although it does not appear in the print. I only call attention to it so that it may appear when the joint resolution is reprinted.

Mr. TELLER. I should like to have a reprint of the joint resolution as now amended, so that we may have it before us in the amended form. I understand that the former print has been exhausted.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. That will be the order, in the absence of objection.

Mr. CARTER. Mr. President, it must be borne in mind, in another point of view, that this Government has recently, by the common consent of all mankind, become one of the great world powers, a recognized if not a dominating force on the globe, and whatsoever is done by the Congress of the country should be with some regard for this universally recognized fact. In the light of such a fact, it seems to me that acting upon a theater or stage in the presence of the whole civilized world we belittle the dignity, we seriously invade the good name of the United States Government everywhere by undertaking upon the floor of the open Senate to make a dicker with the future as a price for present action in giving a vote upon a treaty of peace.

A vote is urged on the resolution preliminary to another vote, and the adoption of the resolution would be in substance and effect a declaration to the world that the people here assembled as representatives of the States have no confidence either in the patriotism or the intelligence or the regard for the Constitution of those who are to dispose of the territory that may come to us through the ratification of the treaty. It does seem to me that the position of our Government thus placed would be most pitiable indeed. Is it possible that we must pledge ourselves to ourselves to be fair and just and generous and decent?

Now, for one, Mr. President, I must give vent to my faith unlimited in those who are to handle the destinies of this Republic throughout the next century. It would have been as useless for resolutions to have been passed in the First Congress of the country trying to control, forestall, and limit legislation for a century, as it would be for us now to undertake to circumscribe, control, and limit the proper and legitimate sphere of Congressional action for the future. To whom would these promises be made, Mr. President? All these resolutions are but a promise, a form of construction which pledges us to do or not to do something in the future. Is it a pledge to those who are openly defying the authority of the United States in the Philippine Islands?

Mr. President, before having that rebellion suppressed through such a supine and trifling promise I would have the Army of the United States out there strengthened and supported until the last man went down who defied the authority or the laws of the United States.

We can not afford, Mr. President, to have it understood that the Army of the United States has been expelled from the Philippine Islands. We went in there with the sovereignty of Spain recognized the wide world over as extending over that archipelago. We overthrew that sovereignty. We seemed to have imported some of this revolution ourselves, running it down from Hongkong to Manila and starting it up in the interior of the country. Shall we now recognize as sovereigns the people whom we transported from Hongkong to Manila and allow them to defy the authority of the United States? Shall we, in order to secure their good will and kindly cooperation, promise them that we and our successors will be honest, decent people, true to the traditions, the Constitution, the laws, and the spirit of our own institutions?

Mr. President, I would not vote for such a petty, trifling promise if it took the entire Army of the United States to advise the Malays and the Orientals that this is one Government, benevolently inclined, but not to be driven one inch anywhere.

I would like to see a change in the foreign policy of the United States, and until such change obtains our trade will not have its proper, robust, and vigorous growth. Let it be understood, Mr. President, that wherever an American citizen is engaged in a lawful pursuit and his right is being invaded, he has 75,000,000 people behind him, with all their resources. I would take that position and enforce it with the same scrupulous regard for the citizen's rights that has marked the supremely grand policy of Great Britain in that behalf.

It must be humiliating to our people to realize that in hundreds of little disputes which have arisen concerning the rights of our citizens abroad they have been compelled time and again to pass by the door of the American consulate and seek the protection of the English, the German, or the French consul.

Mr. MASON. Will the Senator from Montana yield for a question?

Mr. CARTER. Certainly.

Mr. MASON. I quite agree with the Senator, if he will permit me, though I do not wish to interrupt him in the vigorous policy he suggests for the protection of American rights. But, outside of the protocol and the law of conquest that occurred in Manila Bay, have we any authority in the Philippine Islands? And while you are answering that just say in what way, at Iloilo, for instance, you can charge the inhabitants with being in rebellion against the authority of the United States when we even have not a treaty of peace with Spain to take her natives there.

Mr. CARTER. Mr. President, I have made no statement with reference to the legal status of the controversy at Iloilo. The Government of the United States is the only power and authority recognized by the world at large as having control in the Philippine Islands to-day. We humiliated, conquered, and subdued the power of Spain, the legitimate and recognized sovereign of the country prior to the date when Manila was captured.

Now, being the responsible Government there, representing as we do and holding in trust for all mankind, if you please, the future of those islands, the protection of the life and the property of every person residing in the islands, whether he be German or French or Japanese or native, rests with us. Having military control, we can not properly, justly, or with decent regard for the proprieties of life pass a resolution which will in effect say to the rebel forces on those islands, "We will give you everything we fought for and let you use it in your own way without consulting us, if you will just let us alone and permit us to ratify a treaty of peace with the Kingdom of Spain." That is the proposition.

Mr. MASON. Whom are they rebelling against? That is what I want to know.

Mr. CARTER. As soon as the treaty is disposed of we will inquire just who is in rebellion.

Mr. GALLINGER. And against whom.

Mr. CARTER. And against whom they are rebelling. And we will in the most humane way imaginable conciliate the forces or, if they compel us, will whip them to death, one or the other.

Mr. President, this is not said in any spirit of braggadocio, but I do say to every Senator here present, whether in favor of the treaty or not, that the soldiers of the United States can not retreat from that group of islands. They must come away, when they do, if ever, with banners flying and with the full and free and untrammeled consent of their own Government. I would not pass resolutions that would undertake to bring any other force into existence under a pretended policy of the United States which could, with any degree of justification, attempt to expel, on the theory of our own declarations, the soldiers of the United States from the Philippine Archipelago.

TICKET BROKERAGE.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair calls attention to the fact that the hour of 2 o'clock has arrived; and it is the duty of the Chair to lay before the Senate the unfinished business.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

MONDAY, January 30, 1899.

The House met at 12 o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. HENRY N. COUDEN.

The Journal of the proceedings of Saturday was read and approved.

THE CENSUS BILL.

Mr. HOPKINS. Mr. Speaker, I desire to present at this time a report for reference.

The SPEAKER. A privileged report?

Mr. HOPKINS. I think it is a privileged report.

I offer, by instructions of the Committee on the Census, the bill I send to the desk as a substitute for various bills presented to the committee.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. Speaker, before the report of the gentleman is presented, I desire to say that I have some doubt as to whether it is privileged or not.

The SPEAKER. The right of the gentleman in that respect will be reserved; and the Clerk will report the title of the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 11815) to provide for the taking of the Twelfth and subsequent censuses.

Mr. HOPKINS. Mr. Speaker, I desire to inform the House that if nothing is pending to interfere, I will call this bill up for consideration on Monday morning next.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. Speaker, I am unable to state at this time whether I shall raise the question of privilege or not. However I desire to reserve all rights which exist at the present time when this bill is called up for consideration. With the understanding, therefore, that the matter can go over with the right of objection reserved, I shall make no present objection to the presentation of the report.

Mr. HOPKINS. This, I will state, is the unanimous report of the Committee——

Mr. BAILEY. I understand that, and think there will be no objection to the consideration of it. But I merely desire to reserve the points of order which we may be entitled to make against the bill, if on examination it shall be desirable to do so.

The SPEAKER. The Chair would suggest to the gentleman from Illinois that he might possibly lose such rights as may now exist in the committee by reporting the bill at this time and letting it go on the Calendar. Perhaps consent had better be asked—with the reservation of any points of order that may be made against the bill—that it be submitted now as a report from the committee and be held over for consideration until such time as the committee may desire to call it up for action by the House.

Mr. HOPKINS. Then, Mr. Speaker, I would ask unanimous consent that this report may not lose its privilege by being reported now——

Mr. PAYNE. Could it not be reported now and recommitted to the committee, and then called up at their convenience?

The SPEAKER. That could be done.

Mr. HOPKINS. Then I will ask unanimous consent that by making the report now it may not lose any of its privileged character.

Mr. DOCKERY. That is if it has anything of a privileged character.

Mr. HOPKINS. Well, that is a matter for the House to determine when the question is called up. I think myself that it is a privileged report.

Mr. BAILEY. I understood the suggestion of the gentleman from Illinois that he would call the bill up next Monday to be in the nature of a request for postponement.

Mr. HOPKINS. Yes.

Mr. BAILEY. So that it will not lose any privilege that it may now possess.

Mr. HOPKINS. My object——

The SPEAKER. With that understanding——

Mr. HOPKINS. My object in reporting it now was to have the report of the committee printed, to be placed in the hands of each member of the House.

Mr. BAILEY. I think that is desirable, and I am perfectly willing it should be done.

The SPEAKER. It will be printed, then, and considered as postponed until next Monday, subject to all rights and points of order.

REPRINT OF A BILL.

Mr. GRIFFIN. I ask for a reprint of House bill 11770, relating to the employment of women nurses in the Army.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wisconsin asks for the reprint of House bill 11770. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

ARREARAGES OF TAXES IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. JENKINS. Mr. Speaker, I desire to take from the Speaker's table the bill S. 4700 and to move that the House insist upon its amendments and agree to the conference asked for by the Senate.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wisconsin calls up the bill the title of which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (S. 4700) to receive arrearages of taxes due the District of Columbia to July 1, 1898, at 6 per cent interest per annum, in lieu of penalties and costs—

With House amendments thereto.

The House amendments were read.

Mr. JENKINS. I move that the House insist upon these amendments and agree to the conference asked by the Senate.

The motion was agreed to; and the Speaker appointed as conferees on the part of the House Mr. JENKINS, Mr. SPRAGUE, and Mr. RICHARDSON.

ARMY REORGANIZATION.

Mr. HULL. Mr. Speaker, before moving to go into Committee of the Whole on the Army reorganization bill, I want to ask unanimous consent that if the consideration of the bill is concluded to-day, the time from the reading of the Journal up to 3 o'clock to-morrow may be set aside for general debate. I do that at the request of gentlemen on the other side.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa asks unanimous consent that if the consideration of the bill be concluded under the five-minute rule this afternoon, the time between the reading of the Journal and 3 o'clock to-morrow be given to general debate.

Mr. McRAE. The time to be equally divided, of course?

Mr. HULL. The time to be equally divided.

The SPEAKER. The time to be equally divided. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

On motion of Mr. HULL, the House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 11022) for the reorganization of the Army of the United States, and for other purposes, with Mr. PAYNE in the chair.

Mr. MARSH. Mr. Chairman, I move an amendment to be inserted after the word "authorized," in line 5, page 3.

The amendment was read, as follows:

Insert after the word "authorized," in line 5, page 3, the following:

"Provided, That the President in his discretion may enlist only 60 men in a troop of cavalry, or reduce the number of enlisted men in a troop of cavalry to not less than 60, to be organized, so far as noncommissioned officers are concerned, under regulations of the War Department.

Mr. MARSH. Mr. Chairman, in the remarks which I submitted to the House on Thursday of last week I stated to the House that at the proper time I would offer an amendment which would give the Presdent discretionary power as to whether the Army should be increased to the maximum provided in this bill of about 100,000 men.

This amendment is in pursuance of that purpose. If adopted, it will provide in the infantry, artillery, and cavalry about 50,000 enlisted men. If the bill should become law, with a similar amendment of this character attached to the provision relating to the cavalry, the President will have the power, in his discretion, to increase the enlisted force of the Army from 50,000 up to 100,000. I believe, Mr. Chairman, to-day, as I have believed for some time, that that discretion ought to be vested in the President—a discretion that I have no doubt will be wisely and patriotically exercised.

I have been somewhat criticised by my colleague [Mr. JETT] and by my friend from Missouri [Mr. DOCKERY] because at the last session of Congress I opposed the increase of the Regular Army to 104,000 and that now I am in favor of its increase to 50,000, giving the President discretionary power to make it 100,000. The gentleman from Missouri expresses his regret at what he was pleased to call the change that has come over "the gentleman from Illinois." Let me say to the gentleman from Missouri that he ought to be able to comprehend the charge that has taken place in the condition of things since that debate last spring.

At that time, Mr. Chairman, the volunteers of the country were anxious to go, the citizen soldiery of the country were anxious to go into the service of the Government, and, as an illustration, let me call the House's attention to what took place in my own State of Illinois. While under that volunteer law which we passed last spring Illinois was allowed to furnish eight regiments of infantry, one regiment of cavalry, and a battery or two of artillery, yet, so anxious were the citizen soldiers of the State to support the Government in the prosecution of the Spanish war that there were filed with the adjutant-general at Springfield the enlistment rolls of 27 full regiments from the State of Illinois, so anxious, willing, and desirous were the volunteers to fight the battles, when I opposed at that time the increase of the Regular Army.

Now the conditions have changed. The volunteers do not want to do police and garrison duty. The gentleman, my friend from Missouri, perhaps ought to explain his position upon this floor, as he will have to explain it to the people of Missouri when he becomes the Democratic candidate for governor over there. [Laughter and applause on the Democratic side.] While he is supporting a proposition for the raising of 50,000 volunteers for service in these Pacific and West India islands, while he is doing that, he is at the same time bombarding the War Department and the White House to get the volunteers of his own State mustered out of the service. [Laughter.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MARSH. I would like to have a few minutes more.

Mr. HULL. Mr. Chairman, I ask that the gentleman from Illinois be allowed five minutes more, with the understanding that the time be extended to a gentleman on the other side the same as has been extended to my colleague.

There was no objection.

Mr. MARSH. I do not know that I shall use that much time.

Now, I want to say, Mr. Chairman, that so far as my own State of Illinois is concerned, which proffered 27 regiments for the war, for active hostilities, I do not know of even one regiment, or of any considerable number of men, who want to enlist in a volunteer organization for police and garrison duty in the Pacific islands that have come into our possession and ownership, nor in the West India Islands.

Mr. KNOWLES. In the Regular Army?

Mr. MARSH. They will enlist in the Regular Army. A good many of them did enlist in the Regular Army. Those who could not get into the Volunteer Army not only enlisted in my own State in the Regular Army, but so anxious were they to get into the fray that they went down to Mississippi, at the request of gentlemen from Mississippi, to help fill up the quota of that State.

Mr. KNOWLES. With the understanding that they were to be mustered out at the close of the war?

Mr. MARSH. That has always been the case with the Volunteer Army of this country in all its wars—when the fighting was over they wanted to be allowed to go home and to permit the Regular Army to perform the garrison and police duty. That is the position I believe the people of the country occupy to-day; and that is why, Mr. Chairman, I am in favor of increasing the Regular Army from 26,610 enlisted men to 50,000 enlisted men, in the cavalry, artillery, and infantry arms, giving to the President the discretionary right to increase it, if necessary in his judgment, to the extent of 100,000 men, and also giving him the right, after it has been increased under that discretionary power, to reduce it again to 50,000 men when the necessity for the larger force shall have ceased.

Mr. RIDGELY. If this amendment that you offer is adopted, will the bill then have all the official machinery and number of organizations necessary for an army of 100,000 men, and only make it optional with the President to make a reduction in the number of privates?

Mr. MARSH. I would say, Mr. Chairman, that further along in this bill, when we arrive at the proper place, an amendment will be offered by the committee—a majority of the committee—reducing the number of staff officers that are now provided for in the bill.

Mr. RIDGELY. But not of line officers?

Mr. MARSH. Not of line officers. It preserves 3 officers to each company, whether they consist of 60 or 100 or 145 enlisted men.

Mr. RIDGELY. And will continue the same number of military organizations of the various kinds, as required for an army of 100,000?

Mr. MARSH. It will continue the same number of military organizations as provided in the bill.

Mr. RIDGELY. With a full line of officers for all?

Mr. MARSH. With full officers for all.

Mr. HAY. Mr. Chairman, I had intended and prepared to offer an amendment to the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MARSH], and I still propose and will do so; but it shows the impossibility of perfecting the bill on the floor of this House. I want to insert after the word "pay," in the first line, the words "in time of war," and I propose to amend further by adding a proviso, "Provided further, That in time of war the number of enlisted men in a troop of cavalry shall not exceed 100." Now, that is incongruous; it is almost impossible to put that upon the bill or to put the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois upon the bill and make any sense out of it. But I want it made so that this discretion shall be given to the President only in time of war.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment of the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. HAY] to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MARSH].

The Clerk read as follows:

After the word "may," in the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MARSH], insert the words "in time of war."

At the end of the first section add "Provided further, That in time of war the number of enlisted men in a troop of cavalry shall consist only of 60."

Mr. GRIFFIN. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. HAY] misapprehends the application of his amendment to that proposed by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MARSH]. The gentleman from Virginia desires that the President, according to his amendment, shall only exercise his discretion of enlisting in companies 60 men in time of war. His amendment would have been very proper if it had been an amendment to the original bill, for that would constitute a reduction; but in this instance, in order that there may be an exercise of discretion on the part of the Chief Executive in enlisting the minimum number, it must be exercised in time of war. Therefore, I think the gentleman misapprehends the precise situation with reference to his proposition.

Now, Mr. Chairman, in considering this bill last week, it was intimated that the purpose of vesting this discretion in the Chief Executive was merely a subterfuge; that it was without precedent; that it would not accomplish the purpose or desire of the House. I want to call the attention of the House to the fact that that law, the existing law, the law which has been upon the statute book since 1866, as to the three arms of the service, provides that the President may increase the number of enlisted men in each organization at his discretion.

Mr. DOCKERY. Will my good friend allow me?

Mr. GRIFFIN. Certainly.

Mr. DOCKERY. I want to suggest that that discretion only operated in time of war.

Mr. GRIFFIN. If such be the impression of the gentleman from Missouri as to the law, he is mistaken, and in support of my statement I desire to read the law relating to infantry companies. It will be found in section 1107 of the Revised Statutes, in an enactment of July 28, 1866:

SEC. 1107. Each company of infantry shall consist of 1 captain, 1 first lieutenant, 1 second lieutenant, 1 first sergeant, 1 quartermaster-sergeant, 4 sergeants, 4 corporals, 2 artificers, 2 musicians, 1 wagoner, and 50 privates, and the number of privates may be increased at the discretion of the President not to exceed 100 whenever the exigencies of the service require such increase.

War is not made a condition, or an existent condition, of that increase; whatever may be the requirements or exigencies of the service, the President was authorized under that statute to increase the number of privates from 50 to 100.

Mr. DOCKERY. My friend from Wisconsin will remember that the limitation of 26,000 men upon the total number still remains.

Mr. GRIFFIN. I will say in reply to the gentleman from Missouri that that limitation was subsequently affixed.

Mr. MARSH. A good many years subsequent.

Mr. GRIFFIN. A number of years after this law had been enacted and while it was in force. Let me call the attention of the committee to this fact, that no one, anywhere, under any circumstances, has ever found fault with any Chief Executive because he improperly exercised the discretion provided for by that statute. And at this day, at this time, after acting so long under a discretionary power of this kind, without any fault being found with the conduct of the Chief Executive or his exercise of power under it, it is rather late to say that the proposition is a mere subterfuge, or that there is any danger to the rights and liberties of the American people by vesting that power in the Chief Executive.

Mr. Chairman, I am one of those who believe that we can safely trust the Chief Executive of this nation, no matter to what party he belongs, with any discretionary power which may be vested in him. It is not an unusual power, it is in the interest of peace and good order and the maintenance of the dignity of this country, and it ought at all times to exist in the Chief Executive and Commander in Chief of the armed forces of the United States. I think the fact that we have this precedent, and that it has existed so long, relieves the committee of the charge, in renewing the proposition, that it is a subterfuge, after it has met the sanction and approval of the American people, and is one under which they have lived for so many years.

Mr. Chairman, if it be the intention of gentlemen in good faith to see that the Army shall not be increased beyond the number requisite to meet the exigencies, the wants, the necessities of our country, no matter what its policy may be, and conceding that that policy is to be fixed by Congress—if they are sincere, they will not object to the reduction of the Army in accordance with the provision relating to the Executive discretion, which we have submitted and which is agreed to by the majority of the committee. If, on the other hand, they still desire that this bill shall not pass or that no legislation shall be enacted to meet the present emergency, it is well that we so understand it and proceed with the duty of putting this measure in the best possible form agreeable to the friends of the Administration, and then pass it.

This measure seems to be antagonized by those who are naturally opposed to any increase of the Regular Army, and also by the carping class who insist that the Administration shall, before remedial legislation of this character is enacted, announce and declare a positive policy with reference to the final disposition to be made of the Philippine Islands.

Gentlemen should bear in mind that the war with Spain was not sought or desired by either the President or his Administration. Congress alone is responsible for initiating the war and ought to be willing to assume the consequences and the resulting obligations imposed upon us by reason of its own action.

It is to be regretted that those who were most belligerent in bringing about conditions leading up to the passage of the declaration of war now seem to be in little sympathy with those who are endeavoring to best adjust the questions and conditions which have come to us by reason of the war.

Those who oppose the increase of the Army to a proper number for the preservation of our national honor are certainly not maintaining good faith with an Administration which they did everything in their power to force into war when they now undertake to shirk its necessary responsibilities. Good faith on the part of every member of Congress who voted for the declaration of war demands that he should now support the President in his efforts to maintain our national honor. That the Administration will have the support and sympathy of a large proportion of the American people in this emergency can not for a moment be doubted. Those who under other circumstances would align themselves in opposition to an increase in our permanent military establishment believe in the necessity for the proposed increase.

There are those in this Congress who carry their inconsistencies to the extremity of insisting upon an actual demonstration of the number of troops required upon each of our insular possessions and the particular places upon the islands at which they are to be stationed, before making any provision for the care of the islands.

Opponents of this kind well know that it is utterly impossible for any human being to say at this time absolutely at what different point troops ought to be stationed, or how many each garrison should contain. The common judgment of mankind, however, in viewing the entire field, dictates that 100,000 regular troops, enlisted for three years, would give better assurance of the establishment and maintenance of peace and good order, when judiciously distributed, than would any other influence or course that we might exert or pursue.

Expert military men appearing before the Committee on Military Affairs have given it as their opinions that a proper distribution of troops, both at home and on the islands, would require an army of 100,000 men.

The Philippine Islands seem, at the present juncture, to present the most perplexing question, as indicating the necessity for a larger military establishment. Those who favor an increase of the Army hope that placing a sufficient number of troops at points of vantage on the islands will have the effect, without bloodshed or conflict, to cause those who might otherwise feel like offering resistance to abandon any such plan, while an insignificant force would only encourage the rebellious to pursue a course that would lead to further strife and loss of life. Even though we may be mistaken in this policy, we believe that the main principle involved and the possibility of making it a success justify us in carrying it forward.

Again, the amendments which have been proposed to this bill giving the President the discretion to limit the Army to about 50,000 men, in case the emergency be not such as to require a greater number, relieves the friends of the Administration of any supposed intention to permanently foist a large army upon the people. The Chief Executive will be held accountable by the American people for any increase of the armed establishment beyond that actually required by the conditions which confront the nation, and the desire on the part of every Chief Magistrate to secure the universal approval of our citizens operates as a sufficient restraint, if any intention even existed to thwart the wishes of the public.

Experience has taught us that in great emergencies our Chief Executives have invariably awaited the development and crystallization of the sentiment pervading the masses of the people before taking an important step respecting any momentous question.

If, therefore, we will calmly and impartially view the situation in the light of our past history, we ought not to have the slightest hesitation in conferring upon our Chief Executive the most abundant authority and power in the present instance.

Without knowing the definite views of others and speaking only for myself, I have not the least expectation that the Philippine Islands will be annexed or become a part of this country, but should circumstances be such that we could in no other way maintain our honor as a nation or preserve our consistency in view of the causes which prompted the war, I would not consider the annexation of the islands a menace to the perpetuity of our Government and its free institutions. It is our imperative duty, however, to secure control of the Philippine Islands as a part of the property of the United States and to exercise a protectorate over the people thereof until their condition becomes such as to enable them to deal with us properly concerning their independence and the establishment of proper relations between them and ourselves. Those who would ask us to abandon them to their fate overlook the fact that such an act would, in the eyes of the world, be regarded as most dishonorable on our part.

Those who oppose giving the President the authority and power to maintain the national honor extol the victory won by Admiral Dewey in Manila Bay and his subsequent acts in the performance of what he conceived to be his sacred duty as the representative of this Government. None of us take issue with him on anything that he has done, but all laud him for the honor which he has conferred upon our country. By common consent he is the peerless hero of the war, and yet the securing of this unblemished victory renders it necessary for us to honorably solve the problems incident thereto and which now confront us.

It can not be expected that under the circumstances the precise number of troops requisite to meet the emergency can be definitely fixed. There should be sufficient latitude allowed to enable the Administration to send the requisite force to each of the islands as well as the retention of an ample number for the preservation of peace and good order at home. Some gentlemen have been pleased to insist upon knowing what is to be done with the troops which, under this bill, if it becomes a law, will be sent to Cuba, Porto Rico, and the Philippines. They seem to think that there will be nothing for them to do in the islands, or that they are going to our distant possessions for the purpose of ruthlessly shooting down the inhabitants of the islands. They are greatly at fault in both assumptions.

It is not the intention or expectation of the supporters of this bill that war shall be unnecessarily waged upon the people of any of the islands in question. The only object we have in view is to give the President authority to station wherever necessary a force large enough to satisfy the people that obedience to law and the maintenance of peace and good order can and will be enforced by this Government, and thereby avoid any armed conflict. This does not necessarily or legitimately involve either expansion or annexation, and hence the pending measure should be passed without at this time determining whether or not this Government should further pursue the policy of expansion which it has adhered to for nearly a century.

The increase of the Army as proposed is no departure from any time-honored custom or principle of this Government. Although the maximum number is larger than has ever been reached by the Regular Army in the past, yet in all previous emergencies the Army has been increased to meet the particular demands of the time. Our great growth and rapid progress, as well as the increased territory, render the present emergency an exceptional one.

It is to be regretted that the Regular Army should have so few advocates. Every loyal, law-abiding citizen ought rather to be a friend of such an army as we maintain than an opponent of it. To my mind there does not seem to exist any substantial reason for the prejudice which some maintain against our military establishment. The organization is composed of our own citizens. No one can enter the Army unless he be a citizen of the United States, a man of good moral character, and possessing sufficient intelligence for the comprehension and proper performance of his duties. The examinations for several years past have been so strict with reference to the enlistments that only about one out of every four applicants was received into the service.

This is due to the fact that they must be physically acceptable, as well as possessing all the other qualifications which go to make up intelligent, respectable citizens. They are commanded by officers who are citizens of the United States, sent from the various States and communities to be educated at Government expense, and hence are in close touch with our people. They are able and accomplished, as everyone knows who gives the subject the slightest attention. They are deeply interested in the success of our Government and its free institutions. They are American in all their thoughts and habits of life. They are loyal and true to their Commander in Chief under all circumstances, and, with the uses of the Army restricted as they are by law and constitutional provision, it is almost impossible that it should be employed for any purpose other than one which would meet public approval.

There is no danger that the Administration, for the time being, in any emergency would be unmindful of its responsibilities to confine the movements of the Army to its proper field.

The Regular Army ought to be our nation's pride, as it is our hope in time of need. It is the defender and protector of our national honor and our flag. It suffers very much because it can not say to Senators and Members of Congress that it is a part of their individual constituencies, and hence there is no one who feels that he should personally champion its cause.

We appropriate to ourselves the honor and renown won by the Army for our country. We have been much gratified over the victories secured by our Navy and our Army during the past ten months, and it is passing strange that while those victories, so far as the Army is concerned, were mainly won by the permanent establishment, we now hesitate to provide for the increase of that Army to the number that the situation beyond question renders necessary. [Applause.]

Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana and other members addressed the Chair.

The CHAIRMAN. Debate on this amendment has been exhausted, and no further amendment is in order, as there is already an amendment pending to an amendment. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Virginia.

The question being taken, the amendment to the amendment was rejected.

Mr. McCLELLAN. I desire to offer an amendment to the amendment.

Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana. Does the gentleman from New York [Mr. McCLELLAN] desire to be heard on his amendment?

Mr. McCLELLAN. Yes; for a minute or two.

Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana. I have been trying to get the attention of the Chair for a long time. I should like very much to be recognized.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state to the gentleman from Indiana that the Chair has already recognized him a number of times. Other gentlemen have come to the Chair this morning—members of the committee and others—who have not been recognized; and the Chair will feel obliged to recognize those gentlemen, but he hopes to reach the gentleman from Indiana in due time.

Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana. I hope so, for several times on Saturday the Chair refused to recognize me. I do not want to intimate that anything personal was intended or that the Chair is disposed to abuse its power. The Chair has refused several times this morning also to give me recognition——

A MEMBER. "Too much Johnson."

Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana. Too much Johnson for the gentleman who made that remark, it is quite evident.

The CHAIRMAN (rapping loudly with his gavel). The gentleman from Indiana is not in order. The Clerk will report the amendment of the gentleman from New York.

The Clerk read as follows:

Add to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois the following: "And provided further, That in time of peace, except in organizations serving beyond the sea, the enlisted strength of each troop shall not exceed sixty."

Mr. McCLELLAN. Mr. Chairman, I offer this amendment as a friend of the bill. I offer it as a compromise. The main purpose of the increase of the Army above 55,000 or 60,000 men, as provided in the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois, is to use that increase beyond the sea. I know there is a prejudice on the part of some gentlemen to having in service at one time in the United States more than, say, fifty-five or sixty thousand men. Sixty thousand men are certainly all that we need in the United States at one time. Under this amendment the President would have the authority to recruit all organizations enlisted for foreign service up to the maximum allowed in the present Hull bill, and such organizations on returning to the United States would be reduced to 60 men; so that at no time in the United States could we have an army of more than 60,000 if every organization were ordered home at the same time; and if every organization were serving beyond the sea we could have 100,000 men at one time. I offer this amendment as a friend of the bill, in the hope that it will be accepted in good faith.

Mr. BRUCKER. Does the amendment of the gentleman divide the military force into those enlisted for domestic service and those enlisted for service abroad?

Mr. McCLELLAN. Certainly not. It permits the President, in the case, for instance, of a cavalry regiment ordered for service beyond the sea to recruit each unit of organization up to 106, as provided in the Hull bill.

Mr. BRUCKER. Then nothing in the gentleman's amendment divides the service?

Mr. McCLELLAN. Nothing at all.

Mr. HULL. Mr. Chairman, I think the objection to the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York [Mr. McCLELLAN] will be apparent to him when it is stated. A regiment, for instance, may have served in Cuba for six or eight months, and then it may be necessary to bring it home and send another regiment there in its place. Thus there would be a constant enlistment and discharge of privates, which would be exceedingly expensive. To my mind the necessities of the case would be much better met by giving discretion to the President. In this bill, in a section farther on, we have provided that the President may enlist from among the natives of these islands a force to serve there. In the nature of things, such a force will be enlisted very slowly at first. Until we reach the point of having such a force as England has in England and in India, it would be impracticable to keep sending regiments back and forth under his amendment. It is certainly desirable to avoid any such confusion as would result from the discharge of a regiment and taking it home and then enlisting a new regiment to go abroad.

Such exchanges certainly ought not to go on month after month. It seems to me, therefore, that my friend's amendment is not advisable. If we can have a permanent force in the islands and a permanent force in the United States, then, assuming that the President would not exercise his discretion wisely, it would probably be well enough for Congress to limit that discretion by a positive enactment of law.

Mr. McCLELLAN. But it is scarcely supposable that troops will be sent beyond the sea for a less period than the term of their enlistment.

Mr. HULL. Their enlistment will be for three years. Now, it does seem to me you can not keep men in Cuba or the Philippines or Porto Rico for three years. I think it is too long to keep them there. Our men are not acclimated. It seems to me that to put upon the President such a restriction as is proposed may cost the Government a great deal of money and sacrifice the lives of many of our citizens, without accomplishing any good. I hope the amendment will not be adopted.

I recognize the ability and high character of the gentleman from New York, and know that he is friendly to the general features of the bill under consideration, and is a friend in all respects to the Army of the United States. But I do not think, Mr. Chairman, that the amendment ought to be adopted.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the gentleman from New York.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. McCLELLAN) there were—ayes 36, noes 82.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. DE ARMOND. Mr. Chairman, the amendment suggested by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MARSH] seems to be designed to enlarge the discretion of the President of the United States and to increase his control over the Army, rather than to determine the policy of the House of Representatives in dealing with the problems presented by this Army bill.

As I understand the amendment, it is not the intention to provide a smaller army, but the large army of 100,000 men, with a kind of discretionary power or authority vested in the President to reduce it by reducing the various companies to a specified minimum.

Now, if 100,000 men are needed, the discretion lodged in the President, whether likely to be wisely or unwisely exercised, must be a useless if not practically a dangerous surrender of legislative right and power. If there be reason for the exercise of such discretion and a reduction of the force, proposed by the bill, to 50,000 or 60,000 men, then manifestly 100,000 men are not needed, and a provision for that number ought not to find approval in this body.

It has been too much the fashion, Mr. Chairman, for the Congress to part with its constitutional powers and prerogatives, and to confer upon the President that authority which under the Constitution ought to be exercised here.

It is remarkable how, during the discussion of this bill, gentleman after gentleman, leaders upon the other side of the House, have taken pains to disavow any "authority" to speak for the Administration or any knowledge of what its purposes are. The President himself has not seen fit to communicate to Congress his opinion upon the question of expansion and the enlargement of the Army, and we are left to grope in the dark, as far as this debate is concerned, while trying to determine, if we can, the purposes which the "powers that be" have in mind to accomplish through the agency proposed—a huge standing army.

Mr. MARSH. Will the gentleman permit me? The gentleman stated that the President has not indicated his intention in regard to the increase of the Army, or indicated his wishes. The gentleman is mistaken——

Mr. DE ARMOND. That is correct.

Mr. MARSH (continuing). If the gentleman will look at the message of the President, he will find that he did indicate his purpose so far as the extension of the Army is concerned.

Mr. DE ARMOND. The gentleman is correct in that. The President did indicate that there ought to be an increase in the Army, but did not indicate why this increase ought to be made, or indicate to the House or to the country what use was to be made of the great army recommended.

I therefore recur to my former suggestion—that we are left to grope in the dark, so far as this debate is concerned and so far as current history goes, as to the use which is to be made of this Army by the President, if increased as he wishes it to be.

Now, Mr. Chairman, what are the facts before us? Nothing has transpired in the United States to make necessary much increase of the Army. The Indians have ceased to call for troops to fight or awe them. The problem of dealing with them seems to have been settled by the extermination, practically, of the Indians themselves. Instead, therefore, of having any necessity for more troops, instead of an increase of the Army—excepting the addition of the men who may be needed to take charge of the seacoast batteries—the Regular Army in the United States might well be smaller rather than larger. What, then, is the purpose of the proposed increase?

We have reason to hope, we have the right to expect—and, if need be, demand—that soon our forces will be withdrawn from Cuba. Certainly within a short time no reasonable pretext can be found for quartering any part of the Army there. As to Porto Rico, a peaceful present foreshadows a peaceful future. No considerable army will be needed there. So that a few thousand men for our own United States and Cuba and Porto Rico are all that will be needed, as far as we possibly can determine at the present time.

Then this extra call—this increase of the Army—must be for the distant Philippine Islands. Nowhere else can they be employed. Are we to take these islands and incorporate them as a part of the territory of the United States by indirection and in the dark? Are we to depart from the traditional policy of the country, under which we have grown great and prosperous beyond all examples in the history of the world, and depart blindly, heedlessly, without knowing how far we are to go, or when or where or how we are to stop?

But the President's intentions may be gathered in certain provisions of the treaty of peace now pending in the Senate for ratification or rejection. Article IV of the treaty provides:

ART. IV. The United States will, for the term of ten years from the date of the exchange of the ratifications of the present treaty, admit Spanish ships and merchandise to the ports of the Philippine Islands on the same terms as ships and merchandise of the United States.

Article XVI reads:

It is understood that any obligations assumed in this treaty by the United States with respect to Cuba are limited to the time of its occupancy thereof, but it will, upon the termination of such occupancy, advise any government established in the island to assume the same obligations.

By this treaty we have also, in the case of Cuba, a relinquishment of Spanish sovereignty; in the case of the Philippines, as in the case of Porto Rico, a cession. We have a further provision for the payment by the United States to Spain of $20,000,000 for the Philippines. Obligations assumed by the United States under the treaty with reference to Cuba shall terminate when the occupation of that island by the United States terminates. But as to the Philippines, Spanish ships and Spanish merchandise shall be admitted to their ports for the period of ten years on the same terms as United States vessels and United States merchandise are admitted; the United States will so admit them.

It is but reasonable to suppose that this treaty, unmodified, not toned down, means that for the period of ten years, at least, the United States are proposing to govern the Philippines—how much longer we are left to conjecture. The President chose the commissioners who negotiated that treaty. He created a partisan commission, four of the five of his own party, and they did as he bade them. He bought the territory and its inhabitants from the Spanish oppressor. It is to be hoped that the Senate may withhold the sanction of its approval.

For one I am opposed to an increase in the Regular Army beyond what may be suggested by absolute necessity. I am opposed to creating the necessity for the necessity. There is no occasion for an increase in the Regular Army beyond the few artillerists needed along the coast, unless you propose to "expand," to the extent of taking in the Philippine Islands. To that I am opposed. Upon that we are legislating now, though no one dares avow it.

No one is willing to assume the responsibility for it. Certainly it can not be statesmanship thus to plunge away in the dark; thus to go blindfolded along a way that the Republic never has known; thus to start out upon trackless and unfathomed seas, without chart or compass, sailing, drifting blindly wherever wind or chance may carry us, whether into some undiscovered harbor or upon the rocks. I fancy the promoters of the scheme to raise a large army and with it hold the Philippines at the point of the bayonet do not delude themselves with the suspicion that there is aught of statesmanship in what they are doing. It is politics and nothing higher. If politics which have no regard for the principles of our Government or the welfare of our countrymen can prove good politics, then good and bad mean the same thing.

Since you gentlemen really desire to annex the Philippine Islands, since this is the object and policy, why do you not proclaim your purpose, and if you have bounds or limits, fix them?

One gentleman upon the other side says he believes we can amalgamate this distant population and annex with profit these far-away islands. Another is very confident, though he takes great pains to assert that he does not speak for anybody but himself, that in a short time—how long he does not know, does not even hint whether ten years, a hundred years, a thousand years, but "within a reasonable time"—we can, "with honor," depart from those islands.

One gentleman, the venerable member from Massachusetts [Mr. WALKER], suggested that he would give almost untold millions—he told the number, and it was large—if we could be rid of this Philippine problem "with honor." But no one points out how or why there rests upon us any obligation to any other people, any duty to our own people, to assume burdens in the far-distant islands of the sea, when it is so desirable to get rid of those islands. The question is not, Shall we get rid of the islands with their burdens? or, How can we get rid of them? but the practical question is, Shall we blindly take the islands and hope some time to get rid of them?

If the treaty as it is is ratified, the question no longer will be one of acquisition, but one of dismemberment. Never yet have we parted with territory belonging to us. If we take the Philippines and pay for them, many who oppose that action later on will oppose giving them up, unless holding them be attended with appalling disaster.

Ah, Mr. Chairman, the line of safety lies where the centuries have cast it. Safety for us lies where our fathers found it. Safety for us lies in adhering to the principles, the traditions, and the practices of this Republic. It is the best illustration, the best example, the strongest proof, that freemen, by holding fast to the principles of self-government, moving along intelligently and bravely upon correct lines, may accomplish vast and glorious things in the upbuilding of mankind.

And yet we are about to plunge into a sea of difficulties; we are about to overwhelm ourselves with debt; we are about to sentence hundreds and thousands and tens of thousands, perhaps hundreds of thousands, of the young men of our land to exile and death on the other side of the world.

And what is to come from it? Where is the good? Who has pointed it out? Who now will point it out? It is a dream, a vision. There is no promise, there is no assurance, there is no evidence that we are to get any compensating benefit from this dangerous course. No one can tell in what it will result. All that there is inviting us to the Philippines is a vague hope, without foundation, while perils innumerable, only too well founded, darken the way, admonishing us not to court difficulties, but to abide in peace and safety.

Then this Army is to be officered in a political way. Why, a little further on in the bill, for the most important positions men are to be not over 50 years of age and are to be examined physically! Are they to be examined mentally, morally, technically as to the duties of their office? Why, it makes no difference about that, provided they are all right politically. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. HULL. Mr. Chairman, I move that all debate on this section and amendments be now closed.

Mr. DOCKERY. I hope the gentleman from Iowa will allow the gentleman from Indiana to be heard.

Mr. HULL. He can get in just as well on the next section.

Mr. HAY. I have an amendment to the section.

Mr. HULL. My motion would not cut off amendments.

Mr. DOCKERY. It simply cuts off all right of explanation.

The question was taken; and the Chairman announced that the ayes seemed to have it.

Mr. DOCKERY. Division.

Mr. HAY. I call for a division.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 86, noes 92.

Mr. HULL. Tellers, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. HAY. I want to offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman calls for tellers.

Tellers were ordered.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa, Mr. HULL, and the gentleman from Virginia, Mr. HAY, will please act as tellers.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 98, noes 94.

So the motion was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois.

The question was taken; and the Chairman announced that the ayes seemed to have it.

Mr. HAY. I call for a division, Mr. Chairman.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 104, noes 75.

Mr. HAY. I call for tellers.

Tellers were ordered.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois, Mr. MARSH, and the gentleman from Virginia, Mr. HAY, will please act as tellers.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 105, noes 82.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HULL. Mr. Chairman, I want to offer an amendment that is made necessary by the change of language in the bill. In line 10, page 3, strike out the word "enlisted" and insert "appointed," in regard to veterinarians.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 3, line 10, strike out the word "enlisted" and insert the word "appointed."

Mr. HULL. It is simply a verbal amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HULL. Now, Mr. Chairman, on page 2, line 13, before the word "quartermaster," insert the word "regimental." That was omitted in the print.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 2, line 13, before the word "quartermaster," insert the word "regimental."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. GROUT. An amendment, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. HAY. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Vermont offers an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Insert, line 17, page 2, after the word "each," the following: "Provided, That in filling vacancies there shall be appointed annually in the cavalry, artillery, and infantry branches, respectively, at least one second lieutenant from among the graduates of such military schools as are authorized to confer degrees and have been in existence since 1860; and if there be a sufficient number of vacancies, there shall also be appointed one second lieutenant from each institution of learning at which military instruction is given by an officer detailed from the Army.

Mr. COWHERD. Mr. Chairman, I wish to offer an amendment to the amendment.

Mr. HULL. I hope it will be voted down.

Mr. COWHERD. Change 1860 so as to read 1895. Some of the schools in my district were organized since 1860, and are just as good as those that were organized in 1860.

Mr. GROUT. Are they military schools?

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment. No debate is in order.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out 1860, and insert 1895.

The question was taken on the amendment to the amendment, and the Chairman announced that the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. HAY. Division.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 48; noes 91.

So the amendment to the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Vermont.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. HAY. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

In line 5, page 3, strike out the words "eighty-three" and insert the word "sixty;" after the word "authorized," in line 2, insert the words "Provided, That the President may in time of war increase the number of privates to 83 in a cavalry troop."

Mr. HULL. A provision in the bill now gives him that power.

The CHAIRMAN. There seem to be two amendments.

Mr. HAY. I understand that the gentleman's amendment has been adopted; but I understand, also, that it is impossible to get this thing perfected unless you send it back to a committee, where we can examine it thoroughly.

The CHAIRMAN. Debate is not in order.

Mr. HULL. I hope this amendment will not be adopted.

Mr. DOCKERY. I hope the Chair will enforce the rule against the chairman of the committee also.

Mr. HAY. The first amendment is to strike out 83 privates and insert 60.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the first amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

In line 3, page 3, strike out the words "eighty-three" and insert the word "sixty."

The question was taken; and the Chairman announced that the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. HAY. I call for a division, Mr. Chairman.

The House divided; and there were—52 ayes and 91 noes.

So the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the next amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

After the word "authorize," in line 5, insert the words "Provided, That the President may in time of war increase the number of privates to 83 in a cavalry troop."

Mr. HAY. Mr. Chairman, I will withdraw that amendment because of the failure of the other amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the amendment will be withdrawn.

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the next section.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 3. That the regimental organization of the artillery arm of the United States Army is hereby discontinued, and that arm is constituted and designated as the corps of artillery. It shall be organized as hereinafter specified, shall belong to the line of the Army, and, subject to the command and control of superior authority, shall, in matters pertaining to its technical work, be under the supervision of an officer whose title shall be inspector-general of artillery, who shall have the rank, pay, and emoluments of a brigadier-general.

The corps of artillery shall comprise two branches, the coast artillery and the field artillery. The coast artillery is defined as that portion in charge of the fixed and of the movable elements of land defense, including torpedoes and submarine mines operated from the shore, and the field artillery as the portion accompanying an army in the field, and including field or light artillery proper, horse artillery, siege artillery, mountain artillery, and also machine-gun batteries.

All officers of artillery below the grade of brigadier-general shall be placed on one list in respect of promotion, according to seniority in their several grades, and shall be assigned to coast or to field duty by the General Commanding the Army, on the recommendation of the senior inspector-general of artillery, according to their respective qualifications for one or the other kind of duty.

For purposes of coast defense the coast line of the United States shall be, and hereby is, divided into two parts, the Atlantic and the Pacific. Each division shall be under the immediate supervision of an inspector-general of artillery with the rank of colonel, who shall report direct to the General Commanding the Army. The Atlantic division of the coast is defined to include the Atlantic and the Gulf seaboards of the United States and the coast of the Great Lakes, and shall ultimately include the coast line of the West Indian possessions of the United States. The Pacific division is defined to include the Pacific seaboard of the United States, and shall ultimately include the coast line of the various possessions of the United States in the Pacific Ocean.

The personnel of the Corps of Artillery shall, in addition to the one general and two field officers already provided for, consist of 14 colonels, 14 lieutenant-colonels, forty-two majors, 182 captains (14 to be detailed as adjutants), 200 first lieutenants (six to be detailed as aids-de-camp), 168 second lieutenants with batteries, 14 sergeant-majors, 144 batteries of coast artillery, 24 field batteries, 10 bands: Provided, That such numbers of batteries as the President shall direct may be organized as siege, horse, machine-gun, and mountain batteries, respectively.

In respect of enlisted men the composition of a coast battery on a peace footing shall be as follows: One first sergeant; 1 quartermaster-sergeant; 10 sergeants; 16 corporals; 2 musicians, 2 mechanics; 1 wagoner; 2 cooks; 15 first-class privates; 70 second-class privates.

In respect of enlisted men the composition of a field battery on a peace footing shall be as follows: One first sergeant; 1 stable and veterinary sergeant; 1 quartermaster-sergeant; six sergeants; 12 corporals; 4 artificers; 2 musicians; 2 cooks; 91 privates.

Each band shall consist of 1 chief musician, 1 principal musician, 1 drum major (with the pay and allowances of first sergeant), 4 sergeants, 8 corporals, 1 cook, 12 privates.

In addition to the enlisted men specified there shall be 1 electrician sergeant to each post garrisoned by coast artillery, who shall have the pay and allowances of a hospital steward.

The Clerk read the following amendment, recommended by the committee:

In section 3, beginning in line 19, strike out the following: "shall, in matters pertaining to its technical work, be under the supervision of an officer whose title shall be inspector-general of artillery, who shall have the rank, pay, and emoluments of a brigadier-general."

[Mr. DOCKERY addressed the committee. See Appendix.]

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. Chairman, the contention which seems to run through this whole debate pertains, in the first place, to the necessity of an increase in the military force; and, in the second place, to the discretion which it is proposed to lodge with the President of the United States. Now, I assume, Mr. Chairman, that the gentlemen on the other side of the Chamber are in the main disposed to support the substitute reported from the minority of the committee. In that substitute it is provided that there shall be an increase of the Army, regulars and volunteers, for a period of two years, to the number of 80,000 men. Now, in the bill before us it is proposed that the Army shall be increased to 50,000, with a discretion on the part of the President to increase the number to 100,000. So that the difference existing between that side of the House and this is really a matter of 20,000 men. They concede in their report the necessity for an increase of our military force.

Now, as to the discretion to be intrusted with the President against which they contend. I find it proposed in the report of the minority to provide for 50,000 volunteers within the discretion of the President of the United States. Do not those gentlemen thus concede the propriety, under the existing condition of things, of lodging with the President this discretionary power? The only difference between that side of the House and this is as to whether this discretion should be exercised with reference to regulars or with reference to volunteers.

Now, then, much of the talk that we have heard here is irrelevant. All that has been said against the necessity of an increased military force is dissipated in the report made by the minority of this committee. And the only difference existing between the two sides of the House is as to whether the conceded increase of the Army shall be part regulars and part volunteers or whether it shall be all regulars.

Mr. LOUD. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. PERKINS. Yes, sir.

Mr. LOUD. Does not the gentleman discover the distinction between a Volunteer Army enlisted for two years, which we can dispose of at the expiration of two years, and a Regular Army of 100,000 men saddled permanently upon the country?

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. Chairman, I appreciate the distinction that the gentleman points out, but back of that lies the fact that on that side of the House it is conceded that for at least two years this increase is required.

Mr. HULL. And the matter is all within the power of Congress at any time.

Mr. PERKINS. Therefore, very much, if not all, that has been contended for on that side of the House is mere chaff.

Now, the only question that we have really to determine between the two sides of the House, if gentlemen on the other side are honest in the views they have expressed in the minority report, is whether this increase shall be composed entirely of regulars or partly regulars and partly volunteers. A discretion, as all concede, is to be lodged in the hands of the President. That is conceded in the minority report.

Mr. LOUD. But there is a difference in this—that in one case the increase is to be permanent, in the other temporary.

Mr. PERKINS. But the Congress of the United States at all times will have jurisdiction over that question; and if in two years from now it should appear, as the minority side seems to think it will, that this increased force is no longer necessary, Congress can then legislate to reduce the number to what may be required.

Mr. BARBER. I should like to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. PERKINS. I yield for that purpose.

Mr. BARBER. If there should be a reduction of the Regular Army by Congress, would not the officers, so far as it might be necessary to dispense with them, be placed upon retired pay for the rest of their lives?

Mr. MARSH. No.

Mr. PERKINS. Well, Mr. Chairman, that is a question outside of what I am debating. It is a question that the committee are much better qualified to answer than I am. I rose only to call attention to the position occupied by the two sides of the Chamber on this question and to emphasize the fact that there is practically no difference between them.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. HULL. Mr. Chairman, there is no difference of opinion in the committee as to the amendments to this entire section.

Mr. HAY. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Iowa is entirely mistaken, so far as I am concerned.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair would state that debate on this section and all amendments has been exhausted.

Mr. HAY. I do not want to debate the matter.

Mr. HULL. I merely want to state, in this connection, Mr. Chairman, that I do not think there is any difference of opinion in the committee as to this artillery clause.

Mr. HAY. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. PERKINS] made an attack upon the substitute offered by the minority, for which I am responsible——

Mr. PERKINS. Hardly an attack, simply a criticism.

Mr. HAY. Well, I would like to respond to the gentleman, on whatever term he may give to his objection to the substitute.

The CHAIRMAN. The first question before the committee will be on the amendments proposed by the committee, and the Clerk will report the first amendment to this paragraph of the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out in section 3, after the word "authority," the words "shall, in matters pertaining to its technical work, be under the supervision of an officer whose title shall be inspector-general of artillery, who shall have the rank, pay, and emoluments of a brigadier-general."

The question was taken; and the amendment of the committee was agreed to.

Mr. HAY. Now, Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment——

Mr. HULL. Mr. Chairman, there are other amendments from the committee.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair did not understand the gentleman from Iowa as demanding consideration of all of the amendments.

Mr. HULL. I stated, Mr. Chairman, that I wanted the amendments of the committee considered first. I hope the gentleman will allow the committee amendments to be first determined.

Mr. HAY. I prefer, Mr. Chairman, with the consent of the gentleman from Iowa, to go on now.

Mr. HULL. Well, if the Chair rules that the committee amendments are not first in order——

Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair would state that the custom and the rule has been to vote first on the committee amendments; and the Chair will recognize the gentleman from Iowa, and after the committee amendments are disposed of will recognize the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. HAY].

Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana. I do not understand whether the committee amendments are before the committee or not.

The CHAIRMAN. The amendments proposed by the committee will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out, in line 25, on page 3, in section 3, the words "in charge of the fixed and of the movable elements of land defense, including torpedoes and submarine mines operated from the shore" and insert in lieu thereof the words "charged with the care and use of the fixed and movable elements of land and coast fortifications, including the submarine mines and torpedo defenses."

Mr. HULL. Mr. Chairman, on that amendment I ask a vote.

Mr. HAY. Mr. Chairman, I rise——

Mr. HULL. Mr. Chairman, I ask that a vote be taken on the amendment just read.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. Chairman, I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BAILEY. Has debate on the paragraph and all amendments been closed?

The CHAIRMAN. It has not been.

Mr. BAILEY. Well, the gentleman from Virginia, as I understand, desired to address the Chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognized the gentleman from Virginia, but understood that he had concluded what he wished to say.

Mr. HAY. Mr. Chairman, I desired to make reference to the remarks of the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. PERKINS]. I understood the gentleman from Iowa in charge of the bill [Mr. HULL] to say that there would be no further debate, and I took my seat.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will recognize the gentleman from Virginia.

Mr. HAY. Mr. Chairman, I desire, then, to reply to the remarks of the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. PERKINS]. I refer to his remarks on the substitute offered by this side of the House with a view to showing that his remarks were misleading, so far as I have been able to determine.

Now, the minority of the committee proposes not to increase the standing army to the extent of a single man beyond what it was before the war with Spain broke out. We propose to give to the Executive all of the force that the General of the Army said was necessary for the preservation of peace and order in the Philippine Islands. One is a temporary force—an army to be raised to meet an emergency—which can be raised with little cost to the Government. But the proposition here, on the contrary, is the equipment of a regular force of 100,000 men. There is proposed here to give discretion to the President of the United States to exercise his judgment in reference to any increase or decrease that he may think necessary.

But, Mr. Chairman, we all know, and the gentleman knows, that that is a mere subterfuge; that the moment a bill is passed of this character the President of the United States will use his discretion and call out the entire force of 100,000 men. Under the substitute, however, he can not get beyond 80,000 men, excepting under conditions which are prescribed in the substitute bill.

Mr. HULL. Will the gentleman allow a question?

Mr. HAY. Certainly.

Mr. HULL. I do not wish to take the time of my friend, but is not the substitute proposed by the gentleman an addition of 50,000 to 30,000 now in the Regular Army, making a total of 80,000 men?

Mr. HAY. Certainly; but your bill is 100,000, and you can not disguise that fact by saying that the President has "discretion." We give him discretion only to raise a temporary army to meet passing conditions, and you give him "discretion" in a time of profound peace to raise a permanent standing army. That is just the difference between us.

Mr. SIMPSON. Will my friend from Virginia allow a question?

Mr. HAY. Certainly.

Mr. SIMPSON. If I understand the gentleman, the bill provides for 100,000 men as a maximum, and leaves it discretionary with the President whether he would reduce that number to a minimum or not.

Mr. HAY. That is correct.

Mr. SIMPSON. That is to say, it leaves it entirely optional with him as to the reduction?

Mr. HAY. That is right.

Mr. SIMPSON. And the substitute makes a different arrangement and proposes to limit the number to the minimum, except under certain conditions.

Now, does anybody suppose that the President is going to exercise such a discretion as that conferred by the majority proposition and reduce this force?

Mr. HAY. I do not think that anybody makes such a supposition.

Mr. SIMPSON. Certainly nobody but a lunatic would. [Laughter.]

Mr. MAGUIRE. Is it not the purpose of the bill which is now pending to lodge in the President discretion to increase the Army to 100,000 men?

Mr. HAY. That is correct.

Mr. MAGUIRE. And is it not an Administration measure, prepared by the Administration?

Mr. HAY. I have understood that the bill is an Administration bill—an Administration measure. I do not know anything personally about that, but that has been the common talk about it.

Mr. LEWIS of Washington. The bill was prepared in the Adjutant-General's Office, was it not?

Mr. HAY. I can not say about that; I do not know where it was prepared.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Why not ask the chairman of the committee?

Mr. HAY. I do not choose to ask the chairman of the committee. I do not think it would be courteous to do it.

Mr. HULL. The chairman of the committee is perfectly willing to answer the question.

Mr. HAY. What I want to say is that the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. PERKINS] is mistaken in thinking that we are conferring the same discretionary power upon the President of the United States as is being conferred by what is known as the Hull bill, or by what may now be known as the Marsh amendment to the Hull bill. We are providing a machinery which can be put out of existence, and which will, by operation of law, without any discretion of the President at all, be put out of existence the very moment that the necessity for any such army ceases.

Mr. MARSH. Will my colleague allow me?

Mr. HAY. Certainly.

Mr. MARSH. Does my colleague hold that Congress has not the power to reduce the Regular Army two, three, or four years from now, both in its enlisted force and in its commissioned force?

Mr. HAY. Why, I will say to my colleague that I am not exactly an idiot, and therefore I know very well that Congress has the power to reduce the Army down to any size it pleases, but it is a very easy thing to raise an army of a hundred thousand men, and it is a very difficult thing to reduce that Army down, when you contemplate the immense power and the immense influence which will be exerted by the officers of that Army, by the President of the United States, and by all the various people who gather around the Administration for the purpose of office and obtaining office.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana and Mr. SHAFROTH rose.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will recognize the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. JOHNSON] if he cares to be recognized.

Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana. While the pending measure was being discussed in this committee on last Saturday the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON], chairman of the Committee on Appropriations in this House, became involved in a controversy with the gentleman from California [Mr. LOUD], and during the course of the colloquy which ensued between them he made use of certain language to which I tried at the time to get the floor to reply, but was unable to do so. I therefore desire very briefly to call the attention of the House to those remarks to-day and to submit some observations in answer to them. The language to which I refer is reported in the RECORD as follows:

Mr. CANNON. I stand ready now, as I have always stood, ready to help give every dollar from the Federal Treasury that an efficient public service demands [applause on the Republican side], and I hope I will die politically and otherwise when I ever preach any other doctrine. My good friend from California is scared upon this economical question, or he is not as frank as he usually is in this House, and is seeking under the cry of economy to prevent the House from giving the proper armed force for the national defense and the national honor. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana. National defense against whom?

Mr. CANNON. And I for one will not take counsel of the gentleman from Indiana or the gentleman from California in shaping my vote for an increase of the Regular Army, because they are not friendly Indians. [Applause and laughter on the Republican side.]

Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana. I would have liked the gentleman to state against whom we need preparation for a national defense.

Now, Mr. Chairman, when the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] boasted that he stood ready to give every dollar from the Federal Treasury that an efficient public service demanded, there was contained in that statement the implied reflection that those who are opposed to this measure to increase the Regular Army to a hundred thousand men, and who are opposed to taxing the people to pay for it, are not willing to vote that which is necessary for the efficient conduct of the Government. If the gentleman did not intend that his language should have this construction, it is quite evident that it is susceptible of it, and to my certain knowledge that construction was placed upon it by certain members of the House.

Mr. Chairman, I protest here and now against any effort on the part of any gentleman to befog the issue here raised and to put those of us who are opposing this measure in the attitude of attempting to cut off the supplies of the Government. No such purpose exists upon my part. I do not believe any such purpose exists upon the part of any gentleman who is opposing this bill. I am willing, as I have said repeatedly on this floor, to vote for a reorganization of the Army; I am willing to vote for an army of reasonable size; I am willing to vote all the money that is necessary to maintain such an army; but I am absolutely unwilling to vote for an army which is unnecessarily large in point of size, to maintain which will unjustly impose taxes upon the people, and which I firmly and honestly believe is designed, when the treaty of peace is ratified and Congress has adjourned, to be used by the President of the United States for the purpose of furthering his policy of annexing foreign territory against the wishes of the people there residing, and foisting on the country and on posterity a colonial policy. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

I am not deceived, sir, by the proposed change of the pending bill. It received, I have no doubt, the sanction of the President of the United States as it was originally reported. Finding it could not be passed through this House in its original form; that the number of men sought to be raised was too great and the expense too large, and that the people would rebel against it, this proposed amendment is brought in that only 50,000 be authorized by Congress and the President in his discretion may increase the Army 50,000 men more.

Mr. PERKINS. May I ask the gentleman a question? Does the substitute meet your approval?

Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana. I am not advocating the substitute or any particular provision of it. I am speaking of the pending measure, and I say that no man will be deceived by this proposed amendment. It is a pure subterfuge. It is designed to enable gentlemen to quiet their consciences and vote for it, to make them believe that they can excuse themselves for so doing to their constituents. I do not believe, however, that the effect of it will be to mislead and deceive the people. They will see, sir, as you and I see, that it accomplishes, if it becomes a law, precisely what the original bill was intended to accomplish. It gives us an army of 100,000 men.

Mr. Chairman, when I was taken from the floor a bit ago, I had just, through inadvertence, misstated the terms of the proposed amendment to this bill. It does not fix the size of the Army at 50,000 and then confer the power to increase it to 100,000 upon the President, in his discretion; but it fixes the number of soldiers at 100,000 in the first place, as did the original bill, and then provides that the President may reduce the number in his discretion. This amendment, sir, is infinitely more objectionable than as I stated it. It gives us 100,000 men to start on, and, as the gentleman from Virginia very properly observed in his remarks a few moments ago, this army once enlisted, it will be impossible to secure its reduction. Sir, the President of the United States is not the kind of a man who will push aside and resist the combined influence of those who will demand that this army shall be retained at its maximum size after it has once been recruited.

But, Mr. Chairman, what did the gentleman from Illinois mean when he accused the gentleman from California of not giving the proper armed force for the "national defense?" I asked the gentleman that question the other day. I repeat the question to him now. Does the nation require any defense? Are we upon the verge of a war? I apprehend not. I declare not. Is Great Britain threatening us? Not at all. She is our ally. Does France, Germany, or Austria menace us, either singly or in concert? The gentleman will not make any such a claim. Certainly he does not apprehend an attack upon us by Spain? Why, Mr. Chairman, Spain is utterly impotent to do us harm, even if she had the inclination to do so. She is bankrupt in treasury, her fleets are destroyed, her soldiers are scattered and dismayed, many of them being prisoners in the Philippine Islands.

Our condition is one of absolute peace. Ah! Mr. Chairman, it is not for national defense that this great army is designed. It is intended for national aggression. No earthly employment can be found for so many as 100,000 men unless they are to be used in the overthrow of the people of the Philippines. We can not sanction, sir, any such purpose as this. We can not do such a monstrous injustice. We can not enslave others and yet remain free ourselves. For one, sir, I will not consent to create an army for such a purpose.

Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Illinois is chairman of the Committee of Appropriations in this House. Ever since I have been a member of this body I have observed him fighting against extravagant appropriations. There have been times when I have felt that he was going too far in this direction; but I shall not complain of him for this, since such a course is infinitely better than to go to the other extreme.

Now, sir, I want to give the gentleman some figures to ponder over—some figures upon which he can exercise his peculiar genius for economy to the very great advantage of our people. I gave them to the House the other day in a little fuller form, and as yet I have heard no gentleman in all this debate deny their accuracy.

What is our financial condition to-day? We have a deficit in the National Treasury, actual and prospective, as stated by the Secretary of the Treasury in his report, of nearly $180,000,000 for the fiscal years 1898, 1899, and 1900. This, sir, although, as the Secretary declares, our annual revenue from the tariff and war revenue bills for the fiscal year 1899 and 1900 will aggregate $1,200,000,000. Our military and naval establishments for the present fiscal year alone, according to estimates of the Secretary, will reach $310,000,000. Our appropriation for the pension roll for the fiscal year 1899 will be $145,000,000, for our Army $145,000,000 more, and for our Navy $47,000,000 additional—all as the Secretary estimates.

Now, will the gentleman from Illinois inform me how we are going to secure the money with which to pay this immense deficit of $180,000,000; where we are going to procure the revenue with which to pay this $145,000,000 for next year's pension roll, this $145,000,000 for the next year's maintenance of our Army, this $47,000,000 for the support of our Navy? It is apparent that it can not possibly be done from existing revenues. Does not the gentleman well know that it will have to be secured by the increase of our revenue?

Mr. Chairman, we will either have to increase our tariff duties or our war revenue taxes or issue additional bonds. Sir, the increase of our taxation to meet these great changes is as inevitable as that the future will come. Is it not, then, the part of wisdom and statesmanship to exercise great economy now? Can we afford to create here an army four times as large as the Army we had before the war? Can we afford to more than quadruple the expense of that Army? These are the questions to which I invite the attention of the gentleman. As for myself, I answer that we can not, especially when the army so created is designed to be used to further a policy that will oppress an alien people and embark us in a national policy that can only result in trouble and disaster.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana. I desire to have five minutes more.

Mr. SIMPSON. I ask that the gentleman's time be extended.

Mr. HULL. I object.

Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana. What is the use of the gentleman doing that?

Mr. HULL. I want to get on with this bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The time for debate on this section is closed, and the question is on the amendment.

Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana. I do not want to be taken off my feet in this kind of way.

The question was taken; and the amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the next amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

In line 13, after the word "Army," strike out the following:
"On the recommendation of the senior inspector-general of artillery, according to their respective qualifications for one or the other kind of duty."

Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. TERRY. Mr. Chairman, standing true to the great fundamental principles that underlie the very foundations of this Government, and shoulder to shoulder with the great majority of my party and my Democratic colleagues on the floor, I am opposed to the passage of this bill, and I regret that the state of my health, important business before my committee, and urgent calls to service in behalf of people of my State prevented my making the necessary arrangements to take part in the general debate, and I simply rise now to enter my earnest protest against the pending measure.

Under proper limitations and restrictions, I would be willing to vote for a reasonable increase in our Army to carry out the duties and obligations necessarily imposed upon us by all the legitimate results of the recent war; but I am utterly opposed to the imperialistic craze that seems to have invaded the minds of many, and the great body of the people of my section are utterly opposed to it.

We are not willing to place such vast powers in the hands of any Executive who will not frankly avow the real purpose for which he desires such a vast increase in our standing army. My people have too much love for their own liberties and too much respect for the liberties of others, to lend their support to the policy foreshadowed in this measure.

More than four-fifths of the white population of the South are descendants of the men who battled for the great cause of human freedom in 1776, and stood shoulder to shoulder with Washington and Light Horse Harry Lee. We revere their memories and the immortal principles for which they shed their blood. The great principles of the Declaration of Independence, penned by a Southern statesman, are still good enough for us, and the day has not yet come when we are willing to emulate the conduct or indorse the policies of King George III. [Applause.]

Mr. HULL. Mr. Chairman, I want to say to the House there is not a single word being said as to the amendment proposed by the committee. There will be amendments that will be offered that will be legitimately open to debate and difference of opinion, and I move that debate upon the committee amendments be now closed.

Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana. I hope the committee will not do that.

Mr. HAY. I have an amendment to the amendment offered by the committee, and I desire to explain it. It is to this very section, and the gentleman proposes to cut off all debate.

Mr. HULL. My desire is to get on with the bill. Not a word has been said about the amendments, but gentlemen have been talking on the general proposition.

Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana. If a gentleman talks in favor of the gentleman's proposition he can do it, and if he talks against it he can not.

Mr. HULL. I will make my proposition, that all debate be closed in ten minutes, so that the gentleman may have an opportunity to be heard on his amendment.

Mr. BAILEY. Will the gentleman say to the Committee of the Whole how many amendments there are of the committee?

Mr. HULL. We only propose to offer an additional amendment—striking out one general and two field officers to harmonize the bill.

Mr. BAILEY. We will have then completed all the committee's amendments.

Mr. HULL. We have completed the amendments to this section.

Mr. BAILEY. There can be no kind of question but what you will easily conclude your committee amendments, and I think you would save time not to attempt to close debate on the paragraph and amendments. I will say to the gentleman from Iowa that if the progress of debate should render it impossible to reach these amendments there will be no objection on this side of the House, they being purely formal, to agree that they may be pending when the bill is reported to the House, and that would leave gentlemen who desire to address the House an opportunity to do so.

Mr. HULL. The proposition I made this morning was to let in to-morrow this character of debate that we have had to-day. The gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. TERRY] and the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. JOHNSON] under the general debate of three hours to-morrow could have an opportunity to get in on that line.

Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana. That depends upon who is in the chair. [Laughter.]

Mr. HULL. We want to proceed with the consideration of the bill, Mr. Chairman, and I move that all debate on this section and all amendments be closed in ten minutes.

The question was taken; and the Chairman announced that the ayes seemed to have it.

Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana. Division, Mr. Chairman.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 87, noes 67.

Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana. I call for tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and the Chair appointed as tellers Mr. HULL and Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana.

The House again divided; and the tellers reported that there were—ayes 98, noes 83.

So the motion was agreed to.

Mr. ARNOLD. Mr. Chairman, the other side of the House——

Mr. HAY. Mr. Chairman, have we voted upon all the amendments recommended by the committee?

The CHAIRMAN. They have not been voted upon; only the first one. The chairman of the committee made the motion that all debate on the section and the amendments thereto shall be closed in ten minutes.

Mr. HULL. If the gentleman from Virginia gets the floor, he can talk on his amendment.

Mr. ARNOLD. Mr. Chairman, have I the floor?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state that all debate on this particular amendment has been exhausted. The Chair will recognize the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. ARNOLD] when another amendment is reached. The question is on agreeing to the first amendment recommended by the committee.

The amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read the next committee amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out from section 3 the following:
"For purposes of coast defense the coast line of the United States shall be, and hereby is, divided into two parts, the Atlantic and the Pacific. Each division shall be under the immediate supervision of an inspector-general of artillery with the rank of colonel, who shall report direct to the General Commanding the Army. The Atlantic division of the coast is defined to include the Atlantic and the Gulf seaboards of the United States and the coast of the Great Lakes, and shall ultimately include the coast line of the West Indian possessions of the United States. The Pacific division is defined to include the Pacific seaboard of the United States, and shall ultimately include the coast line of the various possessions of the United States in the Pacific Ocean."

Mr. ARNOLD. Mr. Chairman, the other side of the House, especially including the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. JOHNSON] and the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. CARMACK], persists and insists that the President is determined upon an imperial policy—one of conquest, of colonial empire.

The gentleman from Ohio, General GROSVENOR, has given his views, and it all suggests to me with great force that there is much of idle speculation as to what will or should be done with the Philippines, because no man can now tell. The developments of the next few months or years will determine what our duties are and what our policy shall be. It is most unjust, if not cowardly, to assail the President as he has been assailed by the gentleman from Indiana; and the arts of petty politics on the other side of the House, in demanding a statement of a definite policy from the Administration when they well know, or should know, none can now be given, will not be commended or approved by reasonable men anywhere.

It seems to me it should be clear to any reasonable and reasoning man that with the present condition of affairs, our present lack of sufficient and definite information as to the capabilities, character, and general condition of the Filipinos, the inability of human eyes to read the future and what it will unfold to us, the uncertainties, the unexpected developments, the new duties as they will arise, all show conclusively that a definite policy can not be determined or given by any man.

The Philippines came to us, we may say, by the accident of war. We are now in legal, if not actual possession of them. Where, I ask, in all this great nation can we find any man—excepting always the gentleman from Delaware [Mr. HANDY] and the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. TODD]—who, claiming to be a true American, will turn the coward's back when duty and honor call upon us?

The bill under consideration, as now amended in committee, will give us 50,000 men and leave to the discretion of the President an increase to 100,000. But the gentleman from California [Mr. LOUD] said the other day that this discretionary provision meant the full 100,000, and he sees in it a scheme to secure votes for the bill.

I want to say to him there is no scheme and will be no scheme when the President now in the White House controls, no more than when we placed the $50,000,000 in his hands a few months ago to use in his discretion—an act unparalleled in all history.

Had we confidence in his integrity then? Can anyone—and I defy all—point to any act in the whole public life of William McKinley that was not inspired by honest purpose and strictest integrity? Thus far he has led us on with greatest success, and the patriotic people of this great country believe in him and trust him.

No, Mr. Chairman, nothing has been done, nothing will be done by him that will not meet the approval and honest judgment of his countrymen. His past life insures to me that his every act will be guided by honor, wisdom, and integrity, and by that high patriotism which he has ever shown, and which assures us that the nation is in wise and safe hands.

But, Mr. Chairman, the Administration has a settled, definite, determined policy, and I am authorized, by observation, to declare it: "New occasions teach new duties," and President McKinley will meet those duties, as they arise, honestly, fearlessly, conscientiously, and patriotically. [Applause.]

Mr. HAY. Mr. Chairman, I ask the Clerk to read the amendment which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman offer it or is it only for information?

Mr. HAY. For the information of the committee.

The Clerk read as follows:

In line 12, page 5, strike out all after the word "bands" down to and including the word "respectively," in line 14.

Mr. HAY. Mr. Chairman, I want to call the attention of the committee to the fact that under that proviso, while a full artillery arm of the service has been provided for, the President will have unlimited discretion to raise other batteries and to organize them in siege, horse, machine guns, and mountain batteries, as he may see fit. In other words, it leaves him an unlimited power to add as much artillery to the Army as he may see fit over and above the 100,000 men provided for in the bill, because nowhere in the bill is there any limitation upon the 100,000 men which they say the bill will raise. It is simply a bill made up of organizations, saying how many men shall be in each organization.

Mr. HULL. If the gentleman will recur to page 5, lines 11 and 12, he will see that it provides for 144 batteries of coast artillery and 24 field batteries.

Mr. HAY. Yes; but you make the proviso that such numbers of batteries as the President shall direct may be organized as siege, horse, machine guns, and mountain batteries.

Mr. HULL. Well, make it "said batteries," if you want it. It is the present law.

Mr. HAY. Well, I will accept that, and that will cut it out.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri is recognized for three minutes, the remaining time.

[Mr. CLARK of Missouri addressed the committee. See Appendix.]

Mr. HULL. Mr. Chairman, the first question is, I think, on the committee amendment.

The amendment of the committee was considered, and agreed to.

Mr. HULL. Now, I move to amend, on page 5, in lines 4 and 5, by striking out the words "shall in addition to the one general and two field officers already provided for."

Mr. LEWIS of Washington. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. LEWIS of Washington. I wish to make a suggestion.

The CHAIRMAN. Debate has been closed on this section, and on all amendments by order of the committee.

Mr. LEWIS of Washington. I understand that the gentleman from Iowa has offered an amendment?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has offered an amendment; but debate is closed on the amendment, and all amendments to this section; and the question is on agreeing to the amendment which has just been read.

The amendment was considered, and agreed to.

Mr. HAY. Now, Mr. Chairman, I offer a further amendment, on page 5, in line 12, to strike out the word "such"——

Mr. HULL. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. LEWIS of Washington. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that there is no debate on the section or amendment. [Laughter.]

Mr. HULL. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. LEWIS of Washington. Regular order.

The CHAIRMAN. The committee will be in order. The Chair will try to preserve order on the floor.

Mr. LEWIS of Washington. I want an indiscriminate order; not one that discriminates in favor of one side or an individual.

Mr. HAY. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer an amendment here to strike out the word "such," in line 12, and insert the word "said."

Mr. GRIFFIN. I offer an amendment to the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state the amendment.

Mr. GRIFFIN. I move that the amendment be so amended as to insert the word "said" immediately before the word "batteries," in line 13—the first word in that line.

Mr. HAY. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw the amendment I have offered and accept that suggested by the gentleman from Wisconsin.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Wisconsin.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend line 13 by inserting, before the word "batteries," in said line, the word "said."

The amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will proceed with the reading of the bill.

The Clerk read section 4 of the bill, as follows:

SEC. 4. That each regiment of infantry shall consist of 1 colonel; 1 lieutenant-colonel; 3 majors; 15 captains, 3 of whom shall be available for detail as adjutant, quartermaster, and commissary; 15 first lieutenants, 3 of whom shall be available for detail as battalion adjutants; 12 second lieutenants; 1 sergeant-major; 1 quartermaster-sergeant; 1 commissary-sergeant, who shall have the rank, pay, and allowances of a regimental quartermaster-sergeant of infantry; 3 battalion sergeants-major, who shall have the pay and allowances of a first sergeant of infantry; 1 band, and 12 companies, organized into 3 battalions of 4 companies each: Provided, That nothing herein contained shall be construed as abolishing the office of chaplain in each regiment of colored infantry.

Each infantry band shall consist of 1 chief musician; 1 principal musician; 1 drum major, who shall have the rank, pay, and allowances of a first sergeant of infantry; 4 sergeants; 8 corporals; 1 cook, and 12 privates.

Each infantry company shall consist of 1 captain; 1 first lieutenant; 1 second lieutenant; 1 first sergeant; 1 quartermaster-sergeant, who shall have the pay and allowances of a sergeant of infantry; 8 sergeants; 16 corporals; 2 cooks; 2 musicians; 2 artificers; 1 wagoner, and 112 privates, the commissioned officers to be assigned from among those hereinbefore authorized: Provided, That in time of war the President may, in his discretion, appoint an extra second lieutenant for each company of infantry.

Mr. MARSH. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out from the section just read the words in lines 10, 11, and 12 and insert in lieu thereof the following:

Provided, That the President, in his discretion, may enlist only 60 men in a company of infantry, or reduce the number of enlisted men in a company of infantry to not less than 60, to be organized, as to noncommissioned officers, under regulations of the War Department.

That amendment is in line of the amendment I offered to the provision of the bill in reference to the cavalry force. If adopted, this bill will then provide for a force of about 50,000 enlisted men in the three arms of the service, to wit, the cavalry, the artillery, and infantry; and it gives the President discretionary power as to whether he will enlist the Army above that number or not.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I have not taken up any of the time of the committee in the discussion of this bill so far. I am not very well informed on questions relating to the Army of the United States. But in my experience in this House, on all other bills except this, I have found that when a committee have reported a bill for the consideration of the members of the House the committee have always brought the facts and figures with them to sustain the proposition that they advocated.

The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] the other day, in advocating the adoption of this measure, said that we must pass this bill and grant this great increase in the standing army of the United States for the honor and the glory of the American flag. I have never known the gentleman before to be compelled to depend on arguments of that kind to sustain himself on the great bills that he has brought before this House. When he has advocated an appropriation bill carrying millions he has always given the reason why the appropriation should be made and the cause for it. We may not have agreed with him at all times, but he has always been able to offer his reasons why it should be done. But when you come in with this Army bill, you offer no explanation. You do not tell us where these men will be needed or what is the necessity for them at this time.

You say we must increase the standing Army of the United States, because we must maintain law and order and protect the laws of the United States. Is there a man in the United States who doubts that this Congress and every member here stands willing and ready at all times to maintain law and order in this country?

Did you think it necessary, when the great Spanish war was hanging like a thundercloud over this country last spring, to bring in a bill for a standing army? Some of you did, but the Republicans on that side of the House assisted us in defeating that bill, and that showed that they did not recognize the necessity of a large standing army in this country, even when a foreign war was imminent.

And to-day, when our Spanish foe lies stricken at our feet; when Spain has lost her entire colonial possessions; when she can no longer maintain a war ship in the seas; when she has begged for peace and peace has practically been declared; when there are no longer any foreign foes threatening us; when Porto Rico has acknowledged the dominion of the United States and the power of our Government; when the President has said that he proposes to recognize in due time and proper course the liberties of the Cubans; when every foot of territory that we acquired from Spain by the arms of our soldiers is in peace and quiet; when there is no trouble threatened, except that which may come from ourselves in trying to beat down and crush a people who for almost a hundred years have been fighting for their liberties in the Philippines, you come here saying that we need a larger standing army.

Where are you going to use it? Is there a member of the Military Committee, is there a member on that side of the House, who has informed us why we need so many soldiers to garrison this point and so many soldiers to garrison that point? It is a simple proposition. If we need the men, the question where we need them and why we need them can be reduced to a mathematical calculation. If we need a thousand men to garrison Manila, why do you not say that we need a thousand men for that purpose? If we need 2,000 men to garrison Havana, why do you not say that we need the men for that purpose and how long we will need them?

But not one single proposition has come from the Chief Executive of this nation or from the Secretary of War or the Adjutant-General or the members of this committee. Nay, more, not a single statement has come from any member on the floor of this House who advocates this bill to show us where we need these men and why we need them. We are to vote blindly to give you a standing army of a hundred thousand without knowing where we are going to use them or for what purposes they are needed.

Mr. PERKINS. Will the gentleman tell us where he proposes to use the troops provided for in the substitute offered from that side of the House—the 80,000?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I do not believe the 80,000 men to be necessary now.

Mr. HULL. The experts say they are.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. But if the President of the United States says he needs a temporary force, even if he asks for more than are actually needed, I would be willing to give that force to him, because I think two years from now we will be in a better condition to understand the number of men that are needed for a standing army, if we need any increase at all, than now. Two years from now, in all probability, the uncertain conditions that to-day exist in Cuba and in Porto Rico and the Philippines will be at an end.

[Here the hammer fell.]

[Mr. BLAND addressed the committee. See Appendix.]

Mr. DOCKERY. I ask that my colleague be allowed five minutes more.

Mr. BLAND. I understand that gentlemen will object.

Mr. HULL. I move that all debate on this paragraph and amendments be closed in ten minutes.

Mr. HAY. I hope the gentleman will not make that motion.

Mr. HULL. If gentlemen on the committee want to talk on the amendment itself, I will make it twenty minutes, so as to give them time.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa moves that all debate on the section and amendments be closed in twenty minutes.

The question was taken; and the motion was agreed to.

Mr. MAHON. Mr. Chairman, I have not as yet said one word on this great bill before this House. I remember how, a few short months ago, we could see the bloody footprints of the jingoes through and around this Capitol. In that hour I stood by the great President of the United States, hoping and praying that through diplomacy we might prevent the shedding of blood and give to the Cuban people their independence. But those who saw differently, constantly, in season and out of season, urged the President of the United States to declare war against Spain. Mr. Chairman, from that moment to this moment I have stood as an humble member of this House in support of every measure to carry on the war. I did not do like some men, after they had voted to appropriate $50,000,000; like gentlemen on the Democratic side who, when it came to raising the sinews of war, either by issuing bonds or taxation, cast their votes against every war measure and the measure for raising money.

Now, Mr. Chairman, the war has been fought, and in my short time I have not time to allude to its great events; but I want to say this: I have watched the papers of this country—the Democratic papers—and I have watched the Democratic members of this House; I have listened to them attentively, and I have been forced to come to but one conclusion. You say, "Why does not the President say what he intends to do?" I find the Democratic party where I have always found them in the past. They have always been obstructionist and never constructionists. Their whole mission has been "to lie in cold obstruction across the path of this nation." Whenever any great problems were to be solved the Democratic party hindered the solving of the same. Whatever the President and the Republican party are to do in relation to the great questions before us, it will meet with the solid opposition of the Democratic party of this House and country. They propose to force into the next Presidential election the issue they are now making. As a Republican Representative I propose to stand by the Republican President and Republican Administration against their opposition.

Every vote I have to give shall be cast in that direction. I have lived in this country fifty-eight years and I never have seen the day, and I never expect to see the day, that I shall be afraid of an American citizen in the uniform of an American soldier. I am one of the men who believed in the Army of the United States in the past, and I believe that the President will never be a menace to the liberties of the people of this country, but will be a defense. The gentlemen on the other side talk about liberty. I look into their faces and see great tears running down their cheeks when they cry, "Give the Filipinos liberty, the black, swarthy men of the East." Evidently they have forgotten that they are the leaders of the great party who are taking away to-day from half a million of the citizens of this country the most sacred right, the right which is the foundation rock of all liberty, the right of suffrage. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. BARTLETT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MAHON. No; I have only a few minutes.

Mr. BARTLETT. That is what you are trying to do with the Hawaiians.

Mr. MAHON. These gentlemen cry "Liberty!" The gentleman from Missouri asks whether the men on this side of the House are willing to state their position. I stood up in my seat and said yes. I do not know what the President's views are, and I care not, but I represent a great district in the great Commonwealth of Pennsylvania, and I propose to stand here as their representative and try to represent my people as best I can.

Great problems have risen for us to solve. This is not the first time that the Republican party has solved the greatest problems that were ever solved by any nations of the world. The Republican party has fought out the greatest conquest in the cause of freedom that ever was fought in the world. These great problems they will take hold of in the future. I am in favor of this bill. I would have gone further. I would have been against these amendments except out of deference to the chairman of the committee. I am willing to vote to put 100,000 men into the Regular Army of the United States; put them on the islands until violence is overcome and these people are under control and the American citizens in those islands have full protection from the insurgents.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. LEWIS of Washington. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. LEWIS of Washington. I did not rise to take the floor in my own behalf, but I wish to ask the Chairman if, under the rule, any time that is given me can be given to another gentleman?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will decide that question when the gentleman gets the floor. [Laughter.]

Mr. LEWIS of Washington. I think, Mr. Chairman, there is a mutual suspicion in this matter. [Laughter.]

Mr. BOTKIN. Mr. Chairman, I have a letter received from a cadet in our Military Academy who charges that the pending bill provides for the appointment of 800 civilian officers, and further that these civilian officers, under the provisions of this bill, shall outrank in pay and position the graduates of our Military Academy so long as the latter shall serve in the American Army. I desire to ask the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs if that criticism is correct?

Mr. HULL. I beg the gentleman's pardon. I was talking with my colleague and did not hear his question.

Mr. BOTKIN. The cadet charges that the bill provides for the appointment of 800 civilian officers, and that they will outrank in pay and position the graduates of our Military Academy so long as they shall serve.

Mr. HULL. The rank of a man in the Army is determined by the date of his commission. If a man is appointed second lieutenant to-day and another man two months from now, the man appointed to-day will rank the other. The bill as it is proposed to be amended in section 5 makes the West Point cadet the first man to be appointed, and then the man from the ranks, and then the cadet from the schools where there are military instructors. The gentleman from Kansas understands that all second lieutenants get the same pay?

Mr. BOTKIN. Yes. Now, Mr. Chairman, I have but little knowledge of army organization or military affairs, either theoretical or practical, and do not therefore feel competent to either condemn or commend the plan proposed in the pending bill.

Mr. SIMPSON. Will my colleague permit me? I want to suggest to the chairman of the committee that all second lieutenants do not get the same pay. The lieutenants in the cavalry get more than the lieutenants in the infantry.

Mr. HULL. Of course, I meant in the same arm of service.

Mr. SIMPSON. Well, then, let the gentleman be accurate when he makes a statement.

Mr. BOTKIN. I feel disposed, Mr. Chairman, to submit to the judgment of men who have had experience and have real knowledge, so far as the plan of the reorganization of the Army is concerned. And I am ready at all times, as I always have been, to advocate and vote for the enlistment of every man and the appropriation of every dollar needed in peace or war to defend the honor and enforce the just mandates of our Government.

But, sir, I must be allowed some liberty in deciding the size of an army I shall vote for, and also in determining the best method of raising the funds for the support of such army. Gentlemen on this side the Chamber readily concede the importance of maintaining such a standing army in time of peace as may be required to perform whatever garrison work may be necessary within our own borders, or in any other place where justice and duty call us, and also to furnish a respectable number of well drilled and trained officers and men who shall constitute a nucleus for an army in case of war.

In the reorganization of the Army, as in all other public enterprises requiring additional taxation, it is the duty of Congress to observe the most rigid economy consistent with the public welfare, bearing in mind also that it is much easier to enlarge the Army if too small than to reduce it if too large. As a measure in some degree calculated to obviate the necessity of a large and expensive Regular Army, the National Guard should be thoroughly organized in every State. Our young men should be encouraged to enter this organization for the purpose of receiving such military training as might be consonant with their duties in civil life and prepare them for the possible emergency of war. In recruiting the National Guard as great care should be observed in the selection of men for the ranks and for official positions as is necessary in recruiting a volunteer army for actual service in the field. Thus, with a small standing army, say, of 30,000 or 40,000 men, and a well-equipped National Guard of 200,000 or 300,000 men, we should, in my judgment, be fully prepared for any emergency that is at all likely to arise.

I have no sympathy with the theory that the American people must be ruled and held in subjection to law by anything like brute force. With increasing intelligence, with our growth in morals, and our love of peace and order, I firmly believe that with the proper administration of our Government no agency except the ordinary police system of this country will ever be needed to protect the rights of our people and to preserve peace in all our borders. I am slow to believe that any man would advocate the necessity for a powerful standing army to regulate our internal affairs, although it has been mildly charged on one side of this Chamber and almost, if not quite, admitted on the other side. The bare suspicion that a few great capitalists are behind this movement for a standing army four times as large as that we have maintained, and that, too, for the purpose of overawing the labor elements of this country, would be a menace to our national peace. It would arouse the labor and producing classes of our country as nothing else has ever done. If the time has come when a powerful standing army is required to enforce the obedience of American citizens to the laws of the land, the days of this Republic are numbered.

That matters are somewhat unsettled in this country can not be denied, although for two years we have heard much about restored confidence and returned prosperity. Much is said of our increasing foreign commerce and of our growing domestic trade. I am aware that in consequence of foreign crop conditions in 1897 prices advanced in this country, and a measure of temporary prosperity came to those fortunate enough to have products for the improved market. Even now prosperity prevails in some quarters of our country. We have read in the daily press of mighty booms in Wall street. Millions have been piled upon other millions.

It is reported that fortunes aggregating more than half a billion of dollars have been made in Wall street within the past six months. It is stated that Rockefeller has added $30,000,000 to his fortune and the Vanderbilts $20,000,000 or more; while J. P. Morgan, August Belmont, George Gould, and other patriotic American citizens have gathered in many millions more with which to keep the gaunt wolf from their doors. It is quite evident that these stock gamblers, and all American citizens who believe that the United States are a part of Wall street and that the prosperity of the "street" is the prosperity of the whole country, are quite disposed to celebrate amid popping champagne bottles and loud acclaims the return of general prosperity. Only a few months ago the most distinguished citizen of this country in the present period, a gentleman possessing many of the most admirable personal qualities, declared in an eloquent speech that "the time was when the man was seeking the job, but now the job is seeking the man." At that very moment about twenty men lay dead and many others wounded in the great State of Illinois as the result of a deadly conflict over a few jobs. Since then there has not been a week when the public press has been free from news of similar strikes in various parts of our country.

Only a few days since a gentleman made a touching appeal through the Washington Post on behalf of members of the District regiment who are destitute and out of employment. It is an appalling fact that these men, who a few months ago went out amid the plaudits of the people to do battle for this country, and who assisted in maintaining the honor of our flag and the glory of our Republic, have now returned and are seeking in vain in this wealthiest nation on the globe a bare opportunity to earn bread. It is impossible to convince these multitudes of the laboring classes who are in enforced idleness or whose wages have been reduced that general prosperity is in the saddle in this country. It is equally impossible to convince the Western farmer, who sold his wheat crop of 1898 for a little more than half the price realized for his crop of 1897, that prosperity has gone much beyond the speculators.

Prosperity has indeed come to a comparatively few of our people, but to the many life is still a battle for bare existence. We boast of the wealthiest country on the globe. True, but most of the wealth of this country is concentrated in the hands of a few. One of the most towering American statesmen of this generation, a gentleman who for many years reflected honor upon my State and the whole country by his service in the highest legislative body on earth, in a speech of surpassing eloquence on February 15, 1878, said:

> We can not disguise the truth that we are on the verge of an impending revolution. The old issues are dead. The people are arraying themselves upon one side or the other of a portentous contest. On one side is capital, formidably intrenched in privilege, arrogant from continued triumph, conservative, tenacious of old theories, demanding new concessions, enriched by domestic levy and foreign commerce, and struggling to adjust all values to its own standard. On the other is labor, asking for employment, striving to develop domestic industry, battling with the forces of nature, and subduing the wilderness; labor, starving and sullen in cities, resolutely determined to overthrow a system under which the rich are growing richer and the poor are growing poorer; a system which gives to a Vanderbilt the possession of wealth beyond the dreams of avarice and condemns the poor to a poverty which has no refuge from starvation but the prison and the grave. Our demands for relief, for justice, have been met with indifference or disdain. The laborers of the country asking for employment are treated like impudent mendicants begging for bread.

Mr. Chairman, the most startling thing to be said of this statement is that it is a correct portrayal of the then existing conditions in our country. For more than twenty years these conditions have become more and more aggravated. Capital has become more "formidably intrenched in privilege" with each recurring year. It has become more and more arrogant. Its ever-increasing demands for "new concessions" have been so long and so readily acceded to by men in legislative, judicial, and executive positions as to have become a sort of fixed national habit, so much so that an effort put forth in any State to enact or enforce a law to even limit the oppression of the people by corporations and trusts is met with the howling charge that it is an effort on the part of "hairbrained cranks to subvert the present order of things."

It is a fact of history that in the year 1898 more trusts were formed than in any previous year. An aggregate of a billion and a quarter of dollars entered these combinations. The purpose and effect of the formation of trusts in our great mining, manufacturing, and commercial interests is to crowd out the small operator and secure to a few capitalists a monopoly of output, and thus reduce the cost of production and increase the prices of the products. This means less wages for labor, higher prices for the consumer, and greater profits for the capitalists who constitute the trusts.

In an eloquent speech in this Chamber on September 27, 1890, discussing the conflict between the American farmers on one side and the trusts and stock gamblers on the other, the distinguished gentleman from Iowa [Mr. DOLLIVER] said:

> The real anarchist of our day is not the miserable wretch in a garret working out his infernal ideas with gas pipe and dynamite. We need not fear such a man. The true anarchist in modern times is the bloodless spirit of wealth acquired without conscience, a spirit that in all ages has considered property as a mere possession and treated the commonwealth as a cheap and helpless word.

Mr. Chairman, I fully agree with Mr. DOLLIVER that the "true anarchist of modern times is the bloodless spirit of wealth acquired without conscience," and with Mr. Ingalls, that the "system" under which we live "gives to a Vanderbilt the possession of wealth beyond the dreams of avarice and condemns the poor to a poverty which has no refuge from starvation but the prison or the grave;" and so believing, I warn the members of this House and the people of the country that the greatest menace to our free institutions is this growing imperialism of capital, recognized by every intelligent student of our national conditions.

In my humble judgment about the only standing army needed to preserve internal peace, to perpetuate our free institutions, and to hold in loving loyalty to our flag the great mass of American citizens is an army sufficient to drive from the capitals of our nation and our several States the lobbies of the great corporations and trusts of this country, thus leaving our lawmakers unhampered in their efforts to legislate for the whole people.

But in determining the size of our standing Army we must consider our relation to other countries, and especially to those islands of the sea in whose welfare we have suddenly become so much interested. In all these relations we shall have little need of a powerful land force for the accomplishment of legitimate purposes.

Our Navy, already so strong and renowned, should be enlarged and improved. By means of our Navy we shall be able to command the respect and induce the friendship of the great powers of earth, and in large degree hold in check any turbulent elements that may arise in Cuba, Porto Rico, or Hawaii, thus rendering a large land force unnecessary in those islands. The people of Hawaii and Porto Rico seemed eager to be absorbed by us and to enjoy the protection of our flag, and they may be expected to submit cheerfully to the wise and beneficent rule the United States Government is sure to exercise over them. That only a few troops will be needed in Cuba, and they but for a limited time, will be conceded upon reflection that so small a population, living in such close proximity to us and having so many interests in common with us, will readily amalgamate under the potent influences of our civilization, and will, in the not distant future, seek organic union with us.

An additional reason for believing that a small military force will be ample for our purposes in Cuba is the reasonable assumption that this Government will carry out its clearly defined policy toward the people of that island. In his annual message, under date of December 6, 1897, the President said:

> Of the untried measures there remain only recognition of the insurgents as belligerents, recognition of the independence of Cuba, neutral intervention to end the war by imposing a rational compromise between the contestants, and intervention in favor of one or the other party. I speak not of forcible annexation, for that can not be thought of. That, by our code of morality, would be criminal aggression.

This statement, which met the approval of all American citizens at the time, was repeated and emphasized by the President in his message of April 11, 1898, at which time it again received universal indorsement.

The declaration of war adopted on the 18th of April, 1898, by a vote of 42 to 35 in the Senate and 311 to 6 in the House (especially the first and fourth resolutions thereof), clearly sets forth the policy of this Government:

> First. That the people of the island of Cuba are, and of right ought to be, free and independent.
>
> Second. That it is the duty of the United States to demand, and the Government of the United States does hereby demand, that the Government of Spain at once relinquish its authority and government in the island of Cuba and withdraw its land and naval forces from Cuba and Cuban waters.
>
> Third. That the President of the United States be, and he hereby is, directed and empowered to use the entire land and naval forces of the United States, and to call into the actual service of the United States the militia of the several States, to such extent as may be necessary to carry these resolutions into effect.
> Fourth. That the United States hereby disclaims any disposition or intention to exercise sovereignty, jurisdiction, or control over said islands except for the pacification thereof, and asserts its determination when that is accomplished to leave the government and control of the island to its people.

The great mass of our people indorsed this policy at that time, and will continue to do so, not only as to Cuba, but as to all other countries not of our domain.

Mr. Chairman, the public mind is just now engaged almost exclusively with the Philippine question. Probably the chief reason for a large standing army in the minds of those who support the pending measure is that a large force will be required in the Philippine Islands. The well-meant but ill-timed expressions, "Old Glory must forever wave wherever planted," and "The Stars and Stripes must forever float over every land wet with the blood of an American soldier," and "Who will haul down the flag?" have exerted a powerful influence over the public mind under the martial spirit that has swept the country for several months. But all this is mere sentiment, and will not control the American people in their sober second thought.

History points to several places, wet with the blood of American soldiers, where Old Glory has been planted by the force of arms and where we have hauled down the flag. We did it, not through cowardice nor at the mandate of hostile powers, but because to do so was simple justice and in accordance with the principles of our Government. It is the expressed purpose of this Government to "haul down the flag" sooner or later in the island of Cuba. Why should it be thought any less honorable and brave and American to "haul down the flag" in the Philippines or any other place where the principles of eternal justice do not require us to maintain it? Better a thousand times to bring back our flag from every outpost than have its folds tarnished with the blood of oppression.

The invasion of the Philippines was not thought of by the American people at the time we declared war against Spain. Everyone understood the purpose of the war to be the rescue of the Cuban people from Spanish oppression. The country was startled at the roar of Dewey's guns at Manila, and on every side was heard the question, "What has that attack to do with the rescue of the miserable reconcentrados about Havana?" The proper answer was, "The exigencies of war demand that we destroy our enemy's navy and crush his power wherever found, to the end that the contest may soon terminate with assured freedom and independence to the Cuban people." The country accepted the answer, never dreaming that the struggle was to degenerate from a war for humanity to a war for conquest, from a war for liberty and independence to a war of coercion and oppression.

In his address at the peace jubilee at Chicago last October, President McKinley said:

> The war with Spain was undertaken, not that the United States should increase its territory, but that the oppression at our doors should be stopped. This noble sentiment must continue to animate us, and we must give to the world a full demonstration of the sincerity of our purpose.

In the light of this noble statement of the purposes of our war with Spain I ask what means this effort of leaders in both Houses of Congress who are supposed to be nearest the Administration, and of the leading Administration papers of the country, to explain away that fundamental doctrine of the fathers upon which republican government rests, "that all governments derive their just powers from the consent of the governed."

For more than a hundred years this foundation principle has been accepted by all true Americans without equivocation, evasion, or adulteration; accepted as the sheet anchor of our liberty. But just now we are learning for the first time that the Declaration of Independence does not mean precisely what it says and should be taken with large grains of allowance and with much mental reservation. It has become obsolete. We are expanding away from it. It should no longer be read at our Fourth of July celebrations; or, if read, it should not be given the prominence hitherto accorded it in the programme.

What means all this, Mr. Chairman, if not that these teachers of strange doctrines are seeking to prepare the American mind to indorse a policy of coercion and oppression in the Philippine Islands, and for the final acceptance of the imperialism of militarism and commercialism as against a "government of the people, by the people, and for the people."

I now insist that if "the forcible annexation" of Cuba "would be criminal aggression" "under our code of morality," it would be equally criminal to forcibly annex the Philippine Islands. But it is affirmed that we purchased that archipelago from Spain at a cost of $20,000,000, and therefore hold, or will upon the ratification of the treaty hold, a legitimate title to those islands and their inhabitants. Being a layman, I make no pretense to a knowledge of law, and especially of international law; but as a matter of plain common sense and equity, according to American history and standards, I submit that Spain had no just title to those islands.

According to competent and reliable authority, Spain held but one port in all that group at the time the peace commissioners completed their work. The remainder, except Manila, was under the control of the Philippine republic, which had been established several months before the treaty was signed. I therefore hold that this Government has no right to acquire title to the Philippine Islands from the Spanish Government. The original design of the Administration was not to acquire the entire archipelago by "criminal aggression," or by any other method, but simply to secure in a proper way ample coaling stations for naval and commercial purposes. This should be done, in my humble judgment, through negotiations with the people who have fought so long and well for independence, and not by a treaty with their cruel and bloody oppressors.

In connection with the discussion of this Philippine question, and as a pretext for the organization of a powerful standing army, a large portion of which is presumably to be kept in those islands, certain men are making a great noise about our commercial interests. I yield to no man in a desire for the expansion of American commerce, and am ready to support any proper measure for the accomplishment of this end, if found to be in the interest of all the people; but I am not willing to vote for a large standing army to be maintained at enormous public expense and to be used in the suppression of the Filipinos and in opening the way for the profitable investment of the syndicated capital of America and Europe.

In considering this commercial argument, I desire to direct special attention to the following points: First, in 1896 the export trade of the Philippines was $20,000,000; the import trade, $10,000,000; total, $30,000,000. Had all this trade been with this country and distributed equally among our people, it would have amounted to about 42 cents per capita, while the profits to each individual would have been practically nothing. But if a few American capitalists could have monopolized our country's share of the trade and its profits great would have been their gains.

Second, we are to be committed to an open-door policy, which means, as I understand it, that the people of the various countries shall have free and equal access to the Philippine trade. This means no duties on goods brought from those islands to this country. If you believe in a tariff, either for protection or revenue, I beg you to consider this point. No American with small means can succeed in the Philippines single handed and alone. It costs too much to go. Climatic conditions are such that he dare not undertake a permanent residence and ordinary labor. Under no conditions, therefore, can those islands furnish opportunities to the average American citizen.

But a wealthy syndicate can secure large tracts of land on which to grow the products that constitute our chief imports from those islands, viz, sugar, tobacco, and hemp. Unfortunately the climate can not affect these syndicates. They are immunes. While the syndicate in its organized capacity may be operating in the Philippines, employing the cheap labor of that country on cheap lands to raise cheap sugar, tobacco, and hemp, to ship by cheap ocean transportation to this country, entering without tariff duty, to come into competition with American producers and American labor, the individuals composing these syndicates may and doubtless will be in the health and pleasure resorts of this country and Europe living off the fat of the land. Under the new régime the investment of large capital in the productive industries may be expected to greatly increase the volume of products to seek foreign markets. This must add to the embarrassment of the American laborer and producer, and bring enormous increase to the wealth of a few capitalists.

Third, should this Government organize a powerful standing army and use it in suppressing the Filipinos, does anyone doubt that the organized capital of this country and of Europe would exploit great enterprises in the Philippines, monopolize the valuable franchises, and lay under perpetual tribute to "the bloodless spirit of wealth" the resources of that splendid archipelago? And does not this reflection give coloring to the suspicion in many eminent minds of all parties that these exploiters are behind the movement for a powerful standing army, and that the real purpose is to enforce commercialism and imperialism?

Mr. Chairman, it will not be denied that the climatic conditions of the Philippine Islands are inimical to the health of Americans. Everyone who has studied the subject believes that should we attempt to maintain a military force there the mortality of the troops from the ravages of disease will be far greater than has ever yet been known in the American Army. It must also be borne in mind in this connection that we are dealing with eight or ten millions of people who live in their native land and are perfectly adjusted to climatic conditions; that they are not willing simply to exchange their old taxgatherers and taskmasters for new ones; that they are thoroughly innured to war, having for years maintained a desperate struggle for independence from Spanish domination; and that they are determined to maintain to the bitter end against all comers their struggle for an independent government.

In view of these facts, if it be the purpose of the Administration to conquer the Filipinos by the force of arms and hold them in perpetual subjection to the authority of this Government, a hundred thousand men will be found altogether insufficient long to satisfy the insatiable maw of that awful god of war enthroned under a tropical sun. While I believe that every true American is ready to "die to make men free," I do not believe that any considerable number of American citizens will be found willing to enter a standing army which is confessedly to be used to acquire by conquest new territory thousands of miles away in another hemisphere, to subjugate its population, and to recklessly carry our flag into the very storm centers of the Old World's controversies and probable wars. It is absolutely un-American to organize an army for such purposes. And if the Administration have no such designs it is the height of folly to create a standing army of more than 40,000 men.

Gentlemen in this debate have shown from the highest authority that our standing Army in time of peace, on the basis of 25,000 men, has cost the Government on an average $1,000 per annum for each man, or $25,000,000 per annum. Everyone knows that to maintain an army eight or ten thousand miles away, or any other distance from our shores requiring expensive transportation, must cost much above $1,000 per man. It is safe to say that an army of a hundred thousand men provided for in this bill, if used in large part in the Philippines, would cost one hundred and twenty-five millions or one hundred and fifty millions per annum. While I would not hesitate to incur this expense should the needs of the country require it, yet I submit that in view of the fact that our expenditures are going beyond our receipts, notwithstanding the high tariff on imports, the recent bond issue, and the great revenue-producing war tax, we should move with exceeding caution in matters which are likely to increase the public expenditures.

I desire to say, Mr. Chairman, that the most astonishing feature of this nation-wide discussion is the stand taken by many zealous propagandists of the religion of Jesus in favor of "criminal aggression" in the Philippines. I am informed that a number of eminent ministers in the church to which I have the honor to belong are insistent upon the organization of a powerful army for the forcible occupancy of those islands, presumably to the end that missionaries may safely go there to establish the church.

I hold it to be the duty of this Government to protect American citizens, of whatever color, politics, or religion, engaged in legitimate business anywhere in this world. It should protect American missionaries of all churches against violence to person or property wherever properly engaged in their work. But American soldiers must not be used to forcibly establish any religion or any church anywhere in this world. Christianity does not propose to conquer by force, but by the resistless power of love. You can not shoot the religion of Jesus into the Filipinos with 13-inch guns, nor punch it into them with American bayonets. The only instance on record of the attempted use of the sword in defense of the Prince of Peace was in the garden when He was in the hands of a mob; and He said to Peter, "Put up again thy sword into his place: for all they that take the sword shall perish with the sword."

If it be said that it is our duty to maintain an army in the Philippines to guard against the encroachments of Spain, I reply: If convinced that the permanent occupancy of those islands by our Army were necessary to deliver those people from the bloody domination of the Spaniard I should favor such occupancy; but every intelligent man knows that Spain, with a bankrupt treasury, a broken and disheartened army, and a navy at the bottom of the sea, will never again attempt to subjugate the Filipinos.

Finally, every consideration of humanity, of civilization, of good morals, and of just government requires us to apply to this question the Golden Rule. If our Government would do unto those people as we would have them do unto us, namely, give them our encouragement and friendly aid in their efforts to establish and perfect an independent government of their own, which shall be adapted to their capacities and conditions, my word for it we shall avoid serious complications and enormous expenditures of blood and treasure, and secure ample opportunities for the legitimate expansion of our commerce. By these methods we shall hold their confidence and good will, and they in turn will joyfully receive our American teachers of religion and civilization.

Mr. CLARK of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, Revision of the pension laws should go along with the reorganization of the Army and the taking on of any provincial relation to lands outside the present territory of the United States. Undoubtedly the soldiers comprising our army in the Philippines, Hawaii, Cuba, and Porto Rico will be in large part inhabitants of those islands. It is worth consideration, both by the American people and their lawmakers, whether or not they want to tax themselves to extend the provisions of the existing pension policy into great sums to be disbursed in other lands and to soldiers of other races. Our existing pension laws are based on three grounds:

First. Upon disability by reason of wound received or disease contracted by any officer, soldier, sailor, or marine in the service of the United States, and in the line of duty when said wound was received or disease contracted. The pension continues while such disability lasts; in the event of death the pension goes to the pensioner's widow, or his child or children under 16 years of age, or, not having those, to his dependent mother, father, orphan sisters and brothers, in that order.

Second. A pension is given to any officer, soldier, sailor, or marine who served ninety days or more in the military or naval service of the United States in the war of 1861–1865, who has had an honorable discharge, and who is suffering from a disability of a permanent character not the result of his own vicious habits which incapacitates him for the performance of manual labor in such a degree as to render him unable to earn a support. In the event of his death his widow becomes entitled to a pension; if she remarries or dies, then the child or children of such soldier or sailor under the age of 16 years receives a pension.

Third. Service in war is a ground for pension; but service pensions only exist for the Revolutionary war, the war of 1812, the war with Mexico, and the Indian wars of 1832 to 1842. No service pension has yet been established for participants in the war of the rebellion, but there is continuous agitation for it, and the precedents of our past legislation give promise that a service pension in that war will be finally granted. It was thirty-five years after the close of the Revolutionary war that the first service pensions were granted the soldiers of that war, and then only to those who were indigent and in needy circumstances. Forty-nine years after the close of the Revolutionary war a service pension was granted to all soldiers of that war who had served not less than six months. Service pensions were granted to soldiers of the war of 1812 fifty-six years after it closed and for sixty days' service; sixty-three years after the close of that war the pension was extended to all who had given fourteen days of service. Service pensions were granted to soldiers and sailors of the war with Mexico thirty-nine years after its close. Service pensions were granted for service in the Indian wars fifty years afterwards.

The operation of service pensions is illustrated by the enactment of the law of 1871 giving pensions for sixty days' service in the war of 1812. This was fifty-six years after the close of that war. In seven years 30,447 original applications for pensions under the act were made by surviving soldiers and 12,256 by widows of soldiers. In 1878 the scope of the law was enlarged so as to give pensions for fourteen days' service. This was sixty-three years after the close of the war. After the passage of this act 4,496 surviving soldiers applied for pensions and 32,980 widows. That makes up to the close of the last pension report 80,179 applications for pensions in the last war with England, beginning fifty-six and sixty-three years after the war ended. When one recalls the history of that war and that President Madison found himself unable throughout to collect soldiers; that General Hull had to surrender Detroit to 700 British soldiers and 600 Indians; that Chicago—then Fort Dearborn—had only 50 soldiers to defend it and these were butchered; that General Brown had but 2,000 men to defend our Canadian line; that there were but 225 American soldiers to take part in the battle of Queenstown Heights; that the gallant Croghan had but 150 men with which to defend Fort Stephenson; that Scott had but a handful of men at Lundy's Lane; that the British general, Ross, with less than 5,000 men, took Washington City and destroyed the Capitol and the White House because there were no American soldiers to defend their nation's capital; that General Jackson, in the one great battle of the war at New Orleans, had only about 2,000 soldiers; that nearly all the men and women who lived under President Madison had long ago passed to the beyond—when one considers these things one not only wonders where these more than 80,000 war heroes were in 1814 when this national capital was being occupied and destroyed by 5,000 British troops. We have equally to admire the repetition of the miracle of the prophet's body in the Valley of Jehoshaphat; the power of a pension to make alive more than 80,000 strenuous patriots who were of fighting and marrying age under the Presidency of James Madison, but who, quickened by the marvelous potency of a pension, can still earn a living wage off the taxpayers of America, although the war in which they participated was eighty-seven years ago.

Another illustration is the Mexican war. In 1887, thirty-nine years after its close—more than forty-nine now—Congress passed a law to give service pensions to those of sixty days' service if over 62 or disabled or dependent. Immediately or subsequently 25,051 survivors and 14,747 widows made original claims for pensions under that law.

In this connection it is interesting to observe that General Taylor officially reported that the total number of men with which he advanced to the Rio Grande was 3,860. He had 2,288 officers and men at Palo Alto in the battle of the 8th of May and 2,222 the next day at Resaca de la Palma. At Monterey he had received the troops called for by reason of the declaration of war and his force had been increased to 6,650 officers and men. At the battle of Buena Vista he had 4,757 officers and men. In General Scott's investment of Vera Cruz his army numbered, in round numbers, 13,000 men. At the battle of Cerro Gordo he had 8,500; when he began his march to the City of Mexico he had 12,776 men, sick and well. Part of his men were drawn from Taylor. The latter had, as we have seen, 4,757 men at Buena Vista and Scott had 12,776. These two commands, a total of 17,533 men by the roster, were the army of Mexico and were the men who began the war at Palo Alto and ended it by the conquest of the City of Mexico. To these are to be added the 224 men under Frémont in California and the not quite 1,800 who formed the "Army of the West," under General Kearny and Colonel Doniphan.

History and the official reports of the commanding officers give an account of less than 20,000 men as the army that made the war with Mexico and carried the flag from the Brazos to the Pacific, from Monterey to the "halls of the Montezumas." A service pension is such a quickener of diligent patriotism that fifty years after the treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo it can gather now nearly 40,000 eager heroes of war to take the money of the American people out of the National Treasury, although when the war was on Zachary Taylor could find less than 5,000 of them in his fierce need at Buena Vista, and Winfield Scott had the help of less than 15,000 of them in his battle-tossed march from Cerro Gordo to the heights of Chapultepec.

There are but two just and adequate grounds upon which pensions can rest; one is disability or death of the soldier during war, the other the service of the soldier during war. Any other ground of pension is an inequity and an injustice, leading, and rightly leading, to pervading and gnawing discontents among both soldiers and citizens.

The people and their lawmakers should avoid two things: one, persistence in any policy which makes it difficult or hazardous for public officials as agents of the people to honestly and lawfully do their duty; the other, persistence in any policy which makes any considerable part of the people feel that they are not fairly treated by their government. The Government of the United States is paying more for pensions than any government in the world. It is paying more for pensions than other governments to maintain armies. Yet the result is not to strengthen the Government by making popular content, but to weaken the Government by increasing popular discontent.
